WMPIRG To Canvas Signatures

By JANE LOCKARD

The kickoff for WMPIRG's petitioning drive on the UMass campus began yesterday with Ralph Nader's appearance at the Cage. During the next few weeks, PIRG volunteers will canvas for signatures from students who believe that WMPIRG (Western Mass. Public Interest and Research Group) can be a vital force for change both on campus and in regional communities.

Students who sign the PIRG petition will indicate their willingness to be taxed $2 per semester in order to support WMPIRG. The tax will later be refunded to any student who is not satisfied that PIRG can fulfill its pledges to the student body.

The money obtained from the student tax will be used to hire a professional, full-time staff and to finance research projects. The staff will be experienced in legal, research, and consumer issues. They will provide advice and assistance to the involved students on the most productive ways to attack current problems. Research projects will concern any issues which the supporting student body feel are important and involve a question of public interest being neglected. Examples of issues which PIRG can investigate are the yearly $60 per student Campus Center fee, pollution of the Connecticut River, and poverty and corruption problems in the Springfield area. Since WMPIRG will involve twenty colleges and universities in Western Mass., problems can be investigated on a regional, as well as a local, level.

The PIRG is a Nader-inspired organization with consumer interests as its major area of concern. Since students have few vested interests in industry and politics, it is possible for them to regard problems of public concern with a fresh viewpoint and to take action to remedy such problems. PIRG efforts in other areas of the country prove that the PIRG can be a vital instrument for change if students are willing to invest the time and the money.

The Oregon PIRG (OSPIRG) succeeded in prosecuting pulp mills along the Wellamette River for dumping prohibited pollutants into the river. OSPRIG also recently won a case concering sex discrimination at Orgeon State U. Women were found to be paid as much as $4,000 less per year than men doing the same job.

The Minnesota PRIG (M-PIRG) conducted a research study after 19 cases of lead poisoning were reported. Their findings influenced both Minneapolis and St. Paul to adopt new restrictive ordinances pertaining to the use of lead paint in housing.

These examples of PIRG projects show what student interest, voluntary taxation, and participation in PIRG can do to remedy the problems of consumer abuse.

Career Placement Can Help

By PHILIP SCHIRMER

(Editors Note: The following article is the first in a weekly series dealing with career opportunities in conjunction with the Career Planning and Placement office.)

Seniors! Graduation is on the horizon and it isn't going to stay there forever. For those "unfortunate few" who have not already formulated post-graduate plans, the Career Planning and Placement office is anxious to help in any way.

Aside from publishing a weekly paper entitled "Career News" which provides information pertaining to visiting company and orgainzation representatives and interview dates, the office offers personal advice and assistance. Seniors, and all others interested, are urged to make use of these services.

Of immediate importance, the CPPO stresses the need for pre-law students to speak to either Harvey Stone or Samuel Goldman in E-20 Machmer hall as soom as possible. Rising admissions standards, due to an astronomical increase in the number of applications has raised the competition level for acceptance to Law schools considerably. (Sound familiar?) The office in E-20 Machmer handles the processing of applications as well as the task of procurring letters of recommendation from deans of the University.

Elsewhere, on Thursday, February, 10, at 7:00, in Herter Auditorium, representatives from the Springfield, Mass. Public Schools will be on hand to discuss hiring policies and forecast teaching opportunities. Prospective candidates are urged to attend.

During the week of February 14, several other school systems will be conducting similar meetings.

Also, a number of companies and organizations will be sending representatives to U-Mass for interviewing purposes. Check the latest issue of "Career News" for complete listings of these events along with directions on how and when to secure an appointment for an interview.

Copies of "Career News" may be obtained at the CPP office, room 239 Whitmore Administration Building.

It's your future.

Assistant Controller Named

William J. Hogan, Jr., has been named assistant controller of the UMass.

Hogan is the former assistant manager of the University's Murray D. Lincoln Campus Center. His new duties will involve close work with the University's Controller William H. Maus in the formulation of financial policies and accounting procedures and internal control of funds.

Before coming to UMass-Amherst in 1966 Hogan was an accountant with the Boston accounting firm of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co. He is a native of Westboro and a 1964 graduate of UMass with a bachelor's degree in business administration. Hogan is presently studying for an M.S. degree in accounting at the University.

Running On A Shoestring

NORMAL, Ill. (AP)-Anthony Komlanc Jr., a junior at Illinois State University, says big time politicians should learn how it feels to run a campaign on a shoestring.

Three months ago Komlanc, 21, announced as an independent candidate for mayor of Normal, a city of 26,396 population in central Illinois, second home of Illinois State University.

"Sometimes I don't even have shoestrings," he says with a laugh. "My total campaign expense so far has been about $10. Students at my frat, Delta Sigma Phi, have chipped in that much."

"I've got to raise some more because I'm having bumper stickers and some buttons made up," he said. "My campaign headquarters can't even think up something catchy-a slogan. So I don't know what the buttons and stickers will say."

"They have a hard enough time pronouncing my name, so I can't make much of that. It's like calm-calm before a storm-and lance-something you stick someone with. Komlanc."

Komlanc, son of the athletic director of Morrison High School, recalls his biggest suprise came when he found only 1,000 of his university's 18,000 students had registered to vote. The election is March 6.

"The city clerk's office ran a very poor registration campaign," he said. "I'm depending a lot on student votes. There are two or three townspeople running and that will dilute the votes and help. The students and townspeople get along very well. The school has grown so much in recent years, I think the citizens resent it."

He says he feels he has a good chance to win the four-year mayor's job which pays $1,500 annually. Charles Baugh, incumbent mayor, announced he will not seek re-election.

Komlanc says his main rival is Carol Reitan, 41, an associate professor of sociology at nearby Eureka College. Her husband is chairman of the ISU history department and their home is in Normal.

Mrs. Reitan agrees that traditional "town-gown" friction is a factor in Komlanc' campaign.

"It's difficult for a student to convince townspeople he'll be on the job for four years, that he really means to stay in the community," she said. "He has virtually no chance of getting the town vote."

Mrs. Reitan considers the mayoral contest is a race between herself and Hal Riss, a local real estate broker.

On the issue of greater participation by the community in City Council affairs, Mrs. Reitan and Komlanc are agreed.

"There is now an alienation between the citizens and the council," said Mrs. Reitan. And Komlanc says he decided to run because "I feel students are interested in the community and need a voice on the City Council."

Candidates Night Set For League Of Woman Voters

The League of Women Voters will hold a Candidates Night on Thursday evening, February 17 at 8:00 p.m. in the Junior High Auditorium. Candidates for contested Town-wide posts in the Amherst Election of February 22 will be given the opportunity to express their ideas and will answer questions from the floor. Don Freeman of Radio station WTTT has agreed to act as moderator. Although the meeting will be televised over Cable-TV on Channel 8, it is hoped the voting public will attend in person to put their questions to the candidates.

Because of the large number of candidates running for Town Meeting Member, it will not be possible to include in the Candidates Night persons running for this position. However, in an effort to inform the electorate of at least a few facts about the citizens running for Town Meeting Member, the Amherst Record will publish next week the answers to a brief League Questionnaire sent to each of the 114 persons who are candidates in the separate precincts for this office. The Record will also publish answers to League Questionnaires sent to candidates for the three year term for Trustee of Jones Library, and to candidates for the Amherst Redevelopment Authority.

Colleges Are The Biggest Ghetto

By TONY GRANITE

THE TWO LEDE PARAGRAPHS OF THE WEEK come from Florida and Michigan. "The American University is the biggest ghetto in our society. If I were to make one rule, it would be that no student could go to college after high school."

The statement was attributed by the Florida State Flambeau to a DVP speaker there, Sam Keen, the consulting editor to Psychology Today magazine.

Meanwhile, the Central Michigan Life's "special affairs editor" put this lede paragraph on a story headed, "Students are models for human art classes"... Ken Tabacsko wrote: "A sophomore coed walked into class, took off her clothes and went to work."

From the ridiculous to the subline, eh?

SPEAKING OF LIBERATED WOMEN brings to mind the review by one Mary Edge of the University of Wisconsin Post (Milwaukee), who wrote glowingly of the first issue of Gloria Steinem's NOW mag, Ms.

Mary put the edge on a closing for her piece: "Most of the ads in Ms. aren't even too sexist," she wrote. "Let's hope the sisters haven't gone too far in this preview issue, selling space for restaurant and liquor ads, and leaving no room for vaginal spray."

Can't win 'em all, sis.

* * * *

AND OUT INDIANA WAY, the Indiana Daily Student reveals that it may cost $120 for a frosh there to have established the world's record for the longest shower ever taken.

Seems that the director of residence halls at IU is due to make the decision as to whether Dave Hoffman will be charged for the water he used during his 174-hour rinsing.

A watchdog newspaper reporter on a local rag estimates that 110,000 gallons of water went down the drain.

But Hoffman isn't worried. He says nobody warned him he'd have to pay for the water.

PLACEMENT SERVICES CUT as a result financial problems at Portland (Ore) State, according to a recent Vanguard. Seems that lowered enrollments in the state college system has resulted in operating in the red.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

☆ By SYDNEY OMARR ☆

Many persons, born under Sagittarius, should now begin to enjoy a higher standard of living. The financial picture, for natives of this zodiacal sign definitely looks brighter in upcoming months. The Sagittarius person finds much in common with Leo, Aries, Libra and Aquarius. Where money is concerned, Capricorn often proves lucky for Sagittarius.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Travel could be postponed without loss. Means that delay in this area now works in your favor. Avoid acting on impulse. Give logic equal time. Some relatives, neighbors may be in mood to quarrel.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Hold off on money deals, outstanding expenditures. Budget requires review. You may be doing same job twice without being aware. Means costs are doubled for nothing. Check with one born under Pisces.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Pressure arises as result of past commitment. Steer clear of legal contests. Wait. Time in on your side. Seek postponement. Friction may exist in partnerships. Make concession, but stick to principles.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): What was supposed to be confidential becomes public knowledge. Be prepared. Inform family of plans. Trying to hide facts would be error. Know this act accordingly. Truth will make you free.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Lover's quarrel occurs unless you are extremely patient, understanding. In dealing with children, know when to draw line. Avoid speculation. Wishful thinking now could find hard facts. Act accordingly.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Review basic values. Get what you need, but avoid duplications. Red tape has tendency now to multiply. Set guidelines and stick to them. Older individual can aid. Throw aside false pride.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Steer clear of senseless disputes with neighbors, relatives. Be sure you are correctly quoted. Some now are anxious to create embarrassing situation. Stand above and beyond pettiness.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): New approach to money question is necessary. Some who were dependable in past now may need checking. Be more independent. Stress originality. Lead instead of follow. Dance to your own tune.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Partnership, marriage, joint efforts are emphasized. Trust hunch. Delay contract signing. Find out more ask questions and utilize time-stalling tactics. Maneuver. Strategy makes all the difference.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Stress versatility. Have alternatives ready. Don't be discouraged by one who seems to know it all. Watch diet. Remember recent resolutions. One who talks behind your back will be exposed.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Friends argue among themselves. Try not to become involved. Key is to be factual. You may be annoyed by red tape, various restrictions. But if you hold your fire you ultimately achieve. Respond accordingly.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Some of your ambitions are not ambitions they are products of frustration. Truth of this could now be hammered home. Key is to be open to creative changes. Don't continue down track that leads nowhere.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are a natural executive, one who does better working in policy-making area. By October, you will be on the move and have opportunity for greater creative expression. You are dynamic and devastating where opposite sex is concerned.

Ski Team Continues Win Streak

Snow conditions for ski racing changed radically during the week by the addition of about 6 inches of snow followed by a hard rain followed by cold weather. It was interesting skiing on Friday--you sometimes but not always broke through the crust into the powder and on turning went through the powder and onto the frozen granular and ice below. It was on these interesting conditions that Amherst College ran its two-run giant slalom on Saturday at the Dartmouth Skiway in Lyme, N.H.

Co-captain Tuck Woodruff, running first for UMass, lost his line in the crud and frozen ice chips, skied two gates backwards, missed the finish gate, went around the officials and through the finish gate from the other side. In all the excitement the timers missed his time and he had a rerun coming. His next two runs were a tie for first place. Co-captain Jerry Curran put 2 good runs together for 6th place. Kurt Syer skiing next also had 2 good runs for a 13th place. Dave Rutter had two good runs for a 17th place. Dick McWade running fifth on demonstrator skis from the Timberline Ski Shop, because he broke his skiis at Middlebury in last week's race put the best two runs of his career together and finished fifth overall. Dave Ferris skiing 6th and last for the varsity on a course now down to bare ice and boiler plate had two good runs and finished 9th. The varsity had a 1st, 5th, 6th, 9th, 13 and 17 out of 80 racers on the hill. Everyone on the hill was excited about the decision on Woodruff's rerun. The referee turned the decision over to the competitions jury and both coaches and racers were so excited about this that they failed to do the necessary addition on the score board. UMass, was, however, doing its homework and any way you added up the times of the five other team members it was a clear first, and the UMass win-loss ration was 20 to 1 no matter what.

Jim Ahearn finished 16th overall and Larry Peck finished 22nd racing near the end of the order. Phil McKeague was the only UMass runner to have trouble and he ripped the toe piece off his ski during his second run after a good first run.

When the three man competitions jury met to decide Woodruff's case they decided that he had received assistance because spectators shouted "Back" and this may have helped him. Without Tuck, UMass had a total team time for the best four racers of 472.3, B.U. was 477.9, B.C. was 484.2, N.U. was 485.5. Tufts, AIC, Amherst, and Bentley finished in that order.

On Sunday on similar snow and with a second very cold day the Eleventh Running of the UMass Winter Carnival Giant Slalom Ski Race was held on the Worden Schuss, a trail with a steep pitch known affectionately as a waterfall, which it very much resembles. The course was set to be a very fast giant slalom and for UMass it was; for many others who could not hold a good line on the ice it was a disaster.

Jim Hansen of BC won the race with a two run time of 133.2, Tuck Woodruff '75 of UMass was one half second behind with a 133.7. Ken Biedeman of BU was third with a 135.8 while "wise old racer" Jerry Curran '72 was fourth. Other finishers for UMass were Dick McWade 11th, Dave Ferris 13, Dave Rutter 14 and Kurt Syer who lost control and skied off the course was 19th.

Jim Ahearn racing B Team at the end of the order on mostly blue ice finished 10th overall and Larry Peck lost a ski and did not finish.

UMass finished first with a total team time for the four best man of 555.4 seconds, B.U. was second with a 566.5, Northeastern was third with 569.9, and Amherst had 583.0. Others in order of finish were B.C., Tufts, AIC, and Bentley. The UMass win loss ratio was now 27 to 1 and another Division Championship seems to be fairly secure.

The next league races are the Tufts slalom on next Saturday and the Bentley Giant Slalom at Bromley, Vt., on Sunday, February 12 and 13. Starting time on both days is 10 a.m.

Olympic Roundup

SAPPORO, Japan (AP) — United States athletes returned Tuesday to the ski slopes and the figure skating rink-the only places they've found any medals in the 11th Winter Olympics-rated as contenders but with little hope for anything more precious than bronze.

Three American girls-Marilyn Cochran, 22, and her sister Barbara, 21, of Richmond, Vt., and Sandra Poulsen of Olympic Valley, Calif.-were capable of schussing into medal honors in the women's giant slalom.

John Mischa Petkevish, 22, of Great Falls, Mont., and Ken Shelley, 21, of Downey, Calif., bore American hopes for a men's figure skating medal into the first round of compulsory figures. Petkevich was given a better chance than Shelley, even though Shelley won the national championship in Long Beach, Calif., last month when Petkevich fell.

From the men's compulsory arena, Shelley had to go into the pairs free skating with Jo Jo Starbuck. They were rated an outside chance for a silver medal and a good chance for a bronze, even though they would have to hoist themselves from fourth place in the compulsories to get it.

Meanwhile, the U.S. hockey team rested up for another whack at giant killing on Wednesday, when it meets the Soviet Union, defending champion in the Winter Olympics. The young American team pulled one of the big upsets of the Games Tuesday by whipping second-ranked Czechoslovakia 5-1.

Janet Lynn, the 18-year-old blonde from Rockford, Ill., brought the United States its second bronze medal in women's figure skating.

She came from fourth place in the compulsories to get it and might have won the silver medal except for a fall. This allowed Karen Magnussen of Canada to take second place with a nearly flawless performance. Julie Lynn Holmes of North Hollywood, Calif., second after the compulsories, dropped to fourth after she too took a spill.

The competition was all for the silver and bronze. Tall Trixi Schuba of Austria had the gold locked up because of the near perfection of her school figures. Even if the more graceful free skaters had gotten through with nary a slip they could not have caught Miss Schuba despite her conservative, mechanical performance.

Miss Lynn's medal, along with the bronze won by Susan Carrock of Ketchum, Idaho, in the women's downhill on Sunday, left the United States near the bottom of the chart.

The Soviet Union had two gold, two silver and one bronze; Switzerland two gold, one silver and one bronze; West Germany two gold and one silver; Austria, Sweden and Japan one gold, one silver and one bronze, each; Norway three silver and four bronze; Finland one silver and one bronze, and Canada one silver.

Ard Schenk, the Dutch hero set an Olympic record of 15:01.35 in winning the 10,000 meter speed skating race. He added this to the 5,000 and 1,500 meter races he won earlier in the week. Another Dutchman, Cees Verkerk, won the silver medal in 15:04.70, and Sten Stensen of Norway took the bronze in 15:07.08.

Sven-ake Lundback, a 24-year-old electrical engineer from Sweden, upset Russia's world champion Fedor Simachov and won the 15 kilometer cross country race in 45:28.24. Simachov was second in 46:00.84 and Ivar Formo of Norway third in 46:02.68.

A handsome Swiss skier who does some work as a movie stuntman, Bernhard Russi, won the men's downhill race in 1:51.43, followed by Roland Collombin of Switzerland in 1:52.07 and Henrick Messer of Austria in 1:52.40. Bobby Cochran of Richmond, Vt., was the top American, finishing eighth in 1:53.39.

East Germans swept both the men's and women's luge events. Anna Marie Muller won the women's event with a time of 2:59.18, followed by Ute Ruhrold in 2:59.49 and Margit Schumann in 2:59.54.

Wolfgang Scheidel won the men's sled ride in 3:27.58. Harrald Ehrig was second in 3:28.39 and Wolfram Fielder third in 3:28.73.

Along with the U.S. hockey team, Sweden scored an upset by tying Russia 3-3. Finland beat Poland 5-1. The only game Tuesday matched Czechoslovakia and Finland.

Mike Curran's alert goaltending was the decisive factor in America's upset victory over the Czechs. "I haven't seen better goaltending in a long while," said Coach Murray Williamson.

America's girl racers faced Austria's Annemarie Proell and other leading European stars in the giant slalom.

In pairs figure skating, Russia's world champions Irina Rodnina and Alexei Ulanov were the favorites. A second Russian pair, Ludmila Smirnova and Andrei Soouaikin, finished second in the compulsories and Manuela Gross and Uwe Kagelmann third.

But Miss Starbuck and Shelley could move up to a medal with an excellent free skating performance. Douglas Berndt and Barbara Brown of Denver and Mark and Melissa Militano of Dix Hills, N.Y., were also entered but appeared to be out of the running.

Peter Karns of Jackson, Wyo., Dennis Donahue of Essex Junction, Vt., Dexter Morse of Aspen, Colo., and W. Jay Bowerman of Eugene, Ore., were U.S. entrants in the biathlon. They faced apparently insurmountable competition from an array of Finns, Norwegians, Russians and Germans with far more experience in this sport.

Gymnasts Crush Pittsburgh

By JANE CROOK

As was expected, the UMass varsity gymnasts crushed the University of Pittsburgh Saturday afternoon by 148.20 to 128.50. Since UMass was heavily favored, the win came as no surprise, as they upped their record to 4-1.

However, the Redmen were not impressive in their easy victory over pitt as their overall performance was below par. Injuries and sickness took their full toll this week, leaving UMass with a tired squad, not really psychologically up for this meet, first of three in eight days. Contributing most to the low team score was an extremely low bar score of 21.80, which kept the Redmen below the crucial 150 mark. Event for event UMass overpowered Pittsburgh, sweeping all six first places, four seconds, and four thirds, while Pitt could only manage three seconds and two thirds.

Leading the Redmen in the meet was co-captain Tony Vacca whose 50.25 total in the all-around event won him top honors. Despite a hampering shoulder injury, Vacca placed in all six events taking firsts on high bar and vaulting, as well as second on parallel bars and floor exercise, and third on still rings and pommel horse. Other strong performances of Massachusetts were John Calabria, on floor, Steve Scuderi on side horse, Jay Aronstein and John Oliver on still rings, Jay Thompson in vaulting, and Dave Genest on parallel bars.

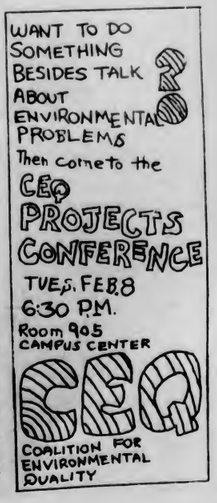
Once again John Calabria paced the Redmen on the floor with his 8.75, good for first place, closely followed by Vacca's 8.55 which tied Pribis of Pittsburgh for second. The first event saw UMass jump to an early lead they would never relinquish.

First place on pommel horse went to Steve Scuderi whose 8.7 routine was a full .8 ahead of his nearest competitor. With a little cleaning, Scuz' difficult routine has the potential of being a 9.0. Pidgeon of Pitt took second with a 7.9, and Vacca took third with a 7.7.

Jay Aronstein's 9.13 easily won him first in the still rings event as he bettered his nearest Pitt opponent by 1.5. UMass dominated this event as Oliver took second with an 8.25 and Vacca tied with Hornicle for third. The Redmen scored 25.05 in this event, so the score at intermission read UMass - 74.5; Pitt - 64.25.

Long horse vaulting saw the Redmen hit two of their highest scores of the day. Vacca's second vault earned him a 9.15 and first place, while the Redmen's most dependable vaulter, Jay Thompson, hit as usual for a 9.1 and second place. Pribis of Pittsburgh was third.

The Redmen took all three places in the parallel bar competition despite some surprising and disappointing breaks. Per usual Co-captain Dave Genest won the event with an 8.6, followed by Vacca's 8.3, and Scuderi's 8.1.



Excepting Vacca's double-twisting-flyaway, an 8.9, and first place, high bar proved pretty horrendous for the Redmen. Three out of four men had major breaks accounting for the team's extremely low score of 21.08. Despite these unusual low scores on one of UMass' strongest events, they easily outscored Pittsburgh, who managed only an 18.25.

The Redmen now have two days to prepare for one of their toughest meets before traveling to Springfield on Wednesday. Coach Kjeldsen will be looking for the strongest lineup possible in an effort to topple the Chiefs. The underdog Redmen hope to be fully prepared and in good health in for arch-rival Springfield. UMass has the potential to win but whether or not they'll put it all together will be seen Wednesday. The Redmen take on the Chiefs at 8:00 P.M. in Springfield's fieldhouse.

Grapplers Capsize Coast Guard

Face Dartmouth Tonight

By JOHN BOCK

The motto of the U.S. Coast Guard is "Always Ready", but a spectator at Saturday's wrestling match in the Cage could testify that the Bears of Coast Guard were anything but ready to take on the Redmen of UMass as they lost 28-5.

It isn't clear whether someone was pulling Coach Barr's leg or not when they were talking about the Coast Guard team. "We were surprised because in the past their boys had always given us some good bouts. Then again we were up for the match because of last year's defeat and the win over Springfield last Tuesday."

The team that Coast Guard brought up from New London highlighted freshman at over half the weight classes. In fact there was only one senior and a single junior on the varsity, while their J.V.'s had mostly sophomores with two juniors.

The Bears put last year's freshman New England Champ, Long, against Dave Amato at 118 pounds. Dave was taken down and ridden out for most of the match came back with two escapes and a very nice takedown of his own in the last few seconds of the bout to win 5-4.

At 126 pounds, Barry Godowsky wrestled somewhat of a comback match as his three points were scored in the last period. Barry was aggressive for the entire bout and was in on his opponent's legs many times but was countered or off the mat when he was just ready to pressure the man. The score was 3-2 against Demmick of Coast Guard and UMass was in the lead 6-0.

The Redmen had Mike McGlaughlin at 134 as the Bears sported Malony. Mike was coming back after an illness and was behind in the first period but through superior riding skills managed a 5-5 draw.

Clay Jester was extremely impressive at 142 as he worked his man constantly for the pin but had to settle for an 11-0 decision and a four point addition to the team score. (Note: New NCAA rule awards four team points for a decision over ten points)

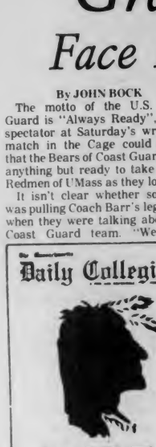
Shelley Goldberg has yet to be defeated or even come close as he breezed through his 150 pound bout with Hutchinson 7-1. Shelley entertained the crowd with his attempts to get his man to work and give him more of a match.

The 158 pound match went UMass' way as Chris Cadawallader beat Coast Guard's Page, one of the few men to beat former UMass New England Champ Tom Young. It was definitely a tough match and Chris pulled it out in the last period by virtue of a point riding time and a point escape.

There wasn't much of a match at 167 as Mike Duffy scored a lopsided 14-3 decision over Healow. Mike showed great proficiency in shrugs and dumps as he used these takedowns repeatedly to pick up points.

Bruce Buckbee walked away with a 7-3 decison over Milner of the Bears and hardly broke a sweat in the process. Fans again saw Bruce work hard for a pin but to no avail as his opponent had a suction cup for a stomach.

Coast Guard picked up their remaining points at 190 as Capacci of Coast Guard decisioned Tom Callaghan 8-0.



Carl Dambman, fat and happy at heavyweight, scored an easy victory over Penn 7-0. Carl showed that his bear hug is nothing to mess with as he scored a five point move right off the whistle. (Two points for a takedown and three for a near fall) Carl is going to have to make the decision as to whether or not he is going to wrestle 190 pounds for the New Englands. A few more easy victories and he may not think too hard.

As effortless as the match was for UMass it did not come without hard work. It would have been quite easy for the team to take it easy after Springfield and let things come as they wish. But the New England title means too much to the Redmen and Coach Barr, and for this same reason they will be just as ready when the Indians of Dartmouth come to UMass tonight at 8:00 P.M. in the Boyden Auxiliary Gym.

Dartmouth is currently ranked sixth in the New England Intercollegiate Wrestling Assoc. poll and coincidentally finished in that same spot last year after the Tournament. They sport Ted Thompson, NEIWA Champ in 1971 at 177, but he has had some defeats this year, one to the URI 177 pounder and more notably to Porillo of Springfield. The Indians also have the freshmen that placed them fourth in the 1971 Freshman New Englands.

So Dartmouth comes heavy with talent to meet the Redmen in the last home meet of the season and the last time the seniors wear the red and white before a home crowd. They won't let the fans down but will the fans let them down? A very poor crowd watched the match at the Cage and the team only hopes that those that weren't there will turn out for Dartmouth.

There will be an on-the-mat clinic for those participants in the upcoming Intramural program and Coach Barr and some of the team will do their best to demonstrate moves and procedures that will help each man's performance in the matches.

A Tale Of Two Runners

By TOM DERDERIAN

Kathy Lawson and Charlotte Lettis traveled north to Burlington, Vermont this Saturday to compete in the Women's region 1 indoor track championships. Lawson won one, the 220 yard dash and placed second in the 50 while Lettis finished second in the mile run.

Kathy Lawson's day started slowly with a 6.4 in the trials for the 50 and continued with an easy 27.6 in the 220. Things picked up a bit in the semi-finals with a 6.0 and a 26.7. Lawson won the 220 in 25.6 seconds which she considered fair indoors. In the final of the 50 Lawson started poorly and placed second to Charlene Johnson who runs for the Police Athletic League of NYC. Their times were respectively 5.9 and 6.0.

Charlotte Lettis ran the first half of the mile right on the heels of 1968 Olympian Francie Johnson. They easily left the rest of the field and passed the half mile in 2:28. On the eighth lap, after a 3:45 3/4 time, Johnson sprinted away to win with a time of 4:57 compared to 5:04 for Lettis.

The UMass pair will compete again in the nationals in NYC on Feb. 25th and next weekend Lettis will run the mile in the New England Championships. Lawson will compete in the shorter dash on Feb. 18th in the Olympic invitationals in NYC. The top two finishers in each event in the nationals will meet the Russians indoors on March 17th.

Czechs Checked

SAPPORO, Japan (AP)-The United States' 5-1 upset victory over the powerful Czechoslovakian hockey team on Monday has the Yanks thinking of an Olympic bronze medal, but those thoughts are surrounded by "ifs."

The U.S. team plays Russia Wednesday and Finland Thursday. Coach Murray Williamson says he wishes the schedule was reversed so his American team would not have to play two top teams, Czechslovakia and Russia, in succession.

But the United States can claim third place if it beats Finland and Poland and if the Swedes or Russians defeat the Czechs.

The Americans got a second win in the Olympic hockey when the Swedish team came back with three third-period goals to tie the Russians 3-3 Monday night. It left the Soviet Union and Sweden tied for first in the Class A standings with a victory and a tie, with Czechslovakia, Finland and the United States tied with one victory and one loss each, followed by Poland with two losses.

Tuesday's only game has Czechslovakia against Finland, which beat Poland 5-1 Monday night.

YanCon Rules On Scholarships In Depth Look Tomorrow

The Yankee Conference has made a new ruling that says from now on Athletic Scholarships must be given on the basis of need.

Former Collegian sports writer Earle Barroll investigated the implications this ruling will have for UMass and spoke with various coaches and officials in the Athletic Department.

Needless to say, this surprising move will be felt by all schools in the Yankee Conference, but the effect it will have on the University and the other schools in the league with expanding programs in sports will also be examined by Barroll.

Barroll's combination commentary and investigation will appear in tomorrow's Collegian and will include the comments and opinions of the people who will be most affected.

Look for this important story in tomorrow's MDC.

Luscomb Discusses History Of Woman's Lib

Jeannette Martineau

Florence Luscomb, the 85-year-old Feminist, last night opened the Colloquium on Women in the Economy and Political System

Florence Luscomb, the 85-year-old Feminist, last night opened the Colloquium on "Women in the Economy and Political System" in Emily Dickinson House, on Orchard Hill, by explaining how woman abolitioners and suffragettes were the forerunners of today's liberationists.

Miss Luscomb, who graduated in architecture from M.I.T. in 1909, has been very involved in social- welfare issues throughout most of her life.

"If this were a hundred twenty or a hundred thirty years ago, we could not legally have been here," she began, explaining that, at that time public-speaking and publishing were considered "unwomanly".

The prevalent thought at that time, Miss Luscomb stated, was that: "man and woman are one, and that one was the husband. There were no public schools for girls. Wealthy families hired tutors and sent their daughters to private schools, but most girls learned only what their families taught them.

"And it was illegal to harbor a runaway wife," she continued, even her own family couldn't take her in. The children belonged to the father. He could give his child away in his will. The Quakers were the only group to recognize the full equality of women.

"The fight to gain freedom was the result of slavery," she said. "Most women were horrified by slavery, and wanted to work in the anti-slavery movement," and cited Lucy Stone, reknown Suffragette, as having "run up against prejudice,...legal restrictions against women."

Miss Luscomb then traced the Suffrage movement and her own involvement for women's rights, citing Lucy Stone, Susan B. Anthony, Elizabeth Katie Stanton, and Dr. Anna Howard Shaw as outstanding spokeswomen and asked "what do children learn about them in history? I am probably the only person alive today who has heard Susan B. Anthony speak."

"The worst part is that women are not considered citizens. At that time (1890), the only people who weren't allowed to vote were criminals, the insane, and women."

"But, by 1919," she announced, "there were 2 million women working for suffrage (on the state level), and termed the women's vote as "politically powerful", and as having caused "Congress to amend the Federal Constitution."

Miss Luscomb cited as the most urgent Women's Rights' issue, the "denial of equal pay for equal work," citing it a matter of "proportions"..."46% of the women work outside their homes...earning 58% of the pay of the men in the same jobs...and it's only 48% in the case of black women."

"Women also need child care centers,...the right to decide when they want children and how many. And women in legislature...to decide on laws on how we should live."

"I'm a third generation (Women's Rightist)", she declared, "and this is the fifth generation. I hope that this generation Liberationists can finish the job."

"The real peril," Miss Luscomb concluded, "is to limit women to the home...and to throw away half of our wealth of brains, and service."

When asked about the division of the Women's Lib Movement into NOW, Radical Feminists, etc., she repeated her advice "to put more emphasis on discrimination in employment. One-tenth of the nations' families are woman-supported," citing the "emphasis on abortion" as "too bad".

About Shirely Chisholm's candidacy, she said that it is "too important that we defeat 'tricky Dicky'" and urged that "we get behind one candidate."

She also advocated "a post-revolutionary form of socialism or communism"...citing this country's "extremes of poverty and wealth."

The Colloquium's purposes, as stated in the introductory material, is "To raise the consciousness of women in particular and through educative means, the university community, in regard to the varied economic roles of women in the university and area."

Future speakers include Laurence Nissonoff, on "The Labor Movement," and Francine Weiskiffon "In the University, the nature and function of their work and study within capitalism."

Court Hearing Set In Westfield Firing

The case of a Westfield State College instructor seeking a court order to prevent his dismissal from the staff has been scheduled for trial in Superior Court June 5.

The action is being brought by Philip C. Shepardson, 37, of 18 Ridgeway Ter., Westfield, against the 14-member board of trustees of the Massachusetts state colleges and Leonard J. Savignano, WSC president.

Through his attorney John M. Greaney, Shepardson yesterday petitioned for a preliminary injunction to restrain the trustees and Savignano from terminating his employment at the college at the end of this academic year.

Representing Savignano and the trustees, Boston attorney Morris M. Goldings opposed the injunction on the ground that denying it would cause no irreparable harm to Shepardson, since there is still time for the case to go to a full hearing before Shepardson's contract expires on Aug. 26.

Superior Court Judge Paul V. Rutledge did not grant the injunction, but assigned the case to the earliest possible date, June 5, and said injunctive relief can be petitioned at that time if necessary.

In Shepardson's bill of complaint, it is alleged that, "Beginning in the latter part of the year 1970, and continuing through the present time, the campus of Westfield State College has become embroiled in a series of disputes and disagreements. Your petitioner is informed and believes that for reasons undisclosed to him, the president of the college...determined that your petitioner should be removed from the teaching staff of the school."

In court yesterday, Greaney said Shepardson's department chairman had not even been consulted on his firing.

Shepardson received a notice of termination last August giving three reasons for his dismissal, according to Greaney; there is no position in television as the college for which he was originally hired in August of 1966; the only other position for Shepardson would be in English or speech; the petitioner failed to obtain 30 additional graduate credits beyond his master's degree in English literature.

Greaney argued yesterday that the reason about the limited openings made no sense since Shepardson has been in the English department for the past six years.

Greaney said an amendment in the rules governing promotions and tenure which requires an instructor to obtain 30 credits in addition to a master's degree before being promoted to the rank of assistant professor is not applicable to persons who initial appointment was made prior to 1968.

The dispute between Sheapardson and the school officials also involves tenure.

Youth Caucus Campaign For Paul McCloskey

As part of the political campaign sponsored by the Massachusetts Youth Caucus 25 students from the 5-College area spent last weekend in New Hampshire working for presidential candidate Paul McCloskey.

"We went from door to door canvassing, doorbell-ringing, and distributing pamphlets supporting Paul McCloskey," said Diane Campbell, a junior at Mount Holyoke College. "It's not that we all support McCloskey," Diane emphasized. "It's that we fell that McCloskey provides a direct confrontation against Richard Nixon."

Michael Barrett, coordinator of the Massachusetts Youth Caucus, further explained in a newsletter why the Caucus was campaigning for McCloskey. He said, "We feel that an enormous number of young people want to become politically involved. They have in common their opposition to Richard Nixon, our continuing presence in the air and on the ground in Southeast Asia, and oppressive measures at home. They do not share a common Presidential candidate. Some have chosen one Democratic contender or another, but most have remained inactive.

"The Youth Caucus is trying to devise a strategy which will put large numbers of young people to work in a way which will increase the probability of a Nixon defeat by a person to the left of Humphrey, but which will not increase the divisions among liberals. We are therefore holding off from endorsing one of the liberal Democrats in the Massachusetts primary. We are trying instead to work for unity among the splintered leftfield. For example, we have encouraged the formation of "unity" slates for the primary, composed of Chisholm, McCarthy and McGovern supporters.

"Pursuing this strategy further, we are mounting a "Back to New Hampshire' movement for Paul McCloskey. McCloskey is worthy of youthful support, but we are not endorsing him as our Presidential candidate. Rather, a good showing by him in New Hampshire's Republican primary against the President will increase the chances for all the liberals of beating Nixon, will allow young people to battle directly our common target, and will not further divide the liberal force."

Diane expanded on Mike Barrett's letter by adding, "We are not to be mistaken for McCloskey's organization."

According to an official release from the Massachusetts Youth Caucus the purposes of the organization are:

"Power not for ourselves, but for what we believe in:

"An end, immediately and completely, to the war in Indochina and the nightmares of an interventionist foreign policy.

"A massive reordering of national priorities to attack full scale the problems of hunger, poverty, education and urban and environmental decay.

"An opening up of the political parties in America to heretofore disenfranchised classes--young people, poor people, Black people, Brown people and women of all ages and races...

"And an end to the administration of Richard Nixon."

According to Diane Campbell, the Massachusetts Youth Caucus has been taking action in a number of other ways besides campaigning in the primaries.

The first major move took place January 8th. About 100 young people gathered in Cambridge, where they discussed tactics and issues of the caucus with former Congressman Allard K. Lowenstein and national Vietnam veteran spokesman John Kerry. "They then set out concrete ways to get things done," said Diane who was at the meeting.

The major emphasis was finding young people who could serve as delegates to the national nominating conventions for their district level slates. Young people were also encouraged and shown how they could run for positions and join local town and state committees. Diane explained, "We want to hit the grass roots."

Another project of MYC involves getting more young people registered to vote. Due in part to action of Youth Caucus, registrars will be available to students in Massachusetts high schools.

Finally, MYC is sending out questionnaires to major political candidates to find out where they stand on issues especially important to youth. The results are to be published and will be made available to young people so that they will be better able to decide on how to vote.

"We eventually want to be sort of a clearing house," said Diane. "Hopefully, we'll be able to motivate people to action. When kids want to help, they can come to us, and then find out where to turn and what they can do."

Concludes Barrett in his newsletter, "The Caucus has no intentions of confining itself to the McCloskey campaign and New Hampshire. We are working to establish Youth Caucus chapters in communities and colleges throughout the state. We want organizers who will involve the Caucus in local issues, in addition to the general questions we mention here and we need fresh ideas and leaders."

Young people interested in working with the Massachusetts Youth Caucus may contact Diane Campbell in North Rockefeller Hall at Mount Holyoke College or Ellen Vollinger, Wester Massachusetts MYC chairman, in Gillette House at Smith College.

Malraux Criticizes Nixon

PARIS (AP)-Andre Malraux says President Nixon's visit to China could become meaningless if he answers "no" to Mao Tse-tung's first question.

The 70-year-old writer has known the Communist chairman for three decades. He told of his misgivings at a luncheon with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

Infirmary Construction To Limit Access

By DON SAINT-PIERRE

The new infirmary extension which was announced in yesterday's Collegian will probably cause a bit of turmoil for UMass students until it is completed.

Construction of the new $1.5 million building, which will get underway in a few weeks, will require limiting the access to, and parking around, the building until its completion sometime in mid-'73.

However, Barry Averil, the Acting Director of Health Services, feels that with some patience and foresight students will not be bothered too greatly during the construction.

Tentative plans call for the installation of steam and power lines beginning the 14th of this month. This project involves digging a ditch in front of the present building which will render the front entrance inaccessible. During this time the Ambulance and Emergency entrance will be used as the Main entrance. Students using the Infirmary facilities are requested, by Averil, to enter through this door, on the south side of the building, then proceed through the corridor to the Information Desk.

The ditch will also eliminate the present parking area located in front of the building. Averil requests, therefore, that students not drive their cars to the Infirmary if at all possible. He suggested getting a ride from a friend or using the Health Services Shuttle which circuits all the dorm areas every half-hour.

Construction of the building itself is expected to begin by June of this year. At this time, a construction fence will be erected around the site and all the already mentioned areas plus Parking Area #4 will become inaccessible.

Averil said that during construction, there will be a sidewalk constructed around the front of the building and through Area #4 for students travelling from the Brett Dorm area to the Public Health Area.

He added that the Infirmary Loop road is now being partially used for "Physicians On Call" parking and that students should make every effort to avoid using these spaces as the doctors need accessibility to their cars for emergency calls.

Nixon Proposes Pollution Tax

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon has proposed his first pollution tax, a levy on the sulfur emitted from the smokestacks of factories and power plants.

Administration spokesmen said the tax would encourage industry to meet regional air-quality standards that take effect in 1975.

To the extent that they don't, however, the sulfur tax could be passed on to consumers in the form of higher prices for electricity and other products.

The sulfur tax was one of a half-dozen legislative proposals promised in a special message on the environment, sent to Congress Tuesday.

Nixon said he will propose a measure encouraging states to take control of the location of highways and airports by 1975. Those which fail to obtain federal approval of their plans by then would start losing federal highway and airport construction aid and land-acquisition money from the Land and Water Conservation Fund.

Each year they delay, their federal aid in these areas would be reduced an additional percentage and would be redistributed to states with approved plans.

Nixon also proposed to discourage the development of coastal wetlands by removing the eligibility of projects located on wetlands from certain tax benefits available to commerical construction.

Two other proposals would seek to control the land disposal of toxic wastes and the soil runoff from construction projects. Each would rely on state regulation under federal guidelines.

Still another proposal would make the harming of an endangered species of animal a federal offense for the first time, subject to criminal penalties.

It also would seek to protect species on the verge of becoming "endangered".

In addition to the legislative proposals, the Nixon message announced a number of executive actions in the environmental field, including:

—A complete ban on the use of poisons to control predator animals on federal land, much of which is used, under permits, for the grazing of cattle and sheep.

—An order for development of standards to protect farm workers from pesticide poisoning.

—An order for preparation of energy-saving new insulation standards for multiple-dwellings built with federal aid.

The sulfur tax would require payment of 15 cents per pound of sulfur oxides emitted from smokestacks when primary standards, designed to protect public health, have not been met.

Nixon proposed the designation of 18 federal parks, monuments and recreation areas as wilderness areas to protect their natural condition.

And, at the same time, he announced that 20 parcels of federal land have been declared surplus and will be transferred to state and local governments for park and recreational use as part of a continuing program.

Minorities And The University

(Editor's Note: The following is a press release by the Minority Members of the Working Group on the Gage Committee in Representation of the Minority Community.)

An important meeting was called on February 2, 1972, by members of the minority communities at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, in order to discuss the work of the Gage Committee and the future of minorities in the University system. There was active and serious across-the-board participation of administrators, faculty, students, staff, and community peoples who criticized the deficiencies which presently exist in the University community and the overt and subtle forms of institutional racism which handicap their progress. The participants insisted on an active part in the dynamic processes of institutional change as these are reflected in a positive program of affirmative action, and also significant minority representation in the decision-making process at all levels of University life.

The participants supported very strongly the immediate implementation of the recommendations of their constituent representatives on the Gage Working Committee and the directional thrust of the Gage Report as it referred to institutional change. The meeting also mandated an immediate expansion of the representation the Gage Working Committee to include five (5) additional representatives, one from each of the constituent groups: Chicanos, Puerto Ricans, Asians, American Indians and Third-World foreign students. It was argued that this would realize effective broad-based participation of minorities on this important working committee.

The meeting culminated with the positive decision of appointing a working group charged with the responsibility of preparing the organizational format to develop a viable context of operation and to provide a sense of direction for the future of minorities at the University of Massachusetts. There was a prevailing sense of unity, seriousness, and purposefulness demonstrated by those attending, and above all, a confidence and preparedness to meet the challenges and confrontations of the present and future.

The present time is a time for struggle; the future is ours.

West Coast Dock Strike Reaches Accord

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Longshoremen and shippers reached tentative agreement Tuesday to end the crippling 123-day-old West Coast dock strike.

The settlement will be submitted to a committee representing locals of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and to individual shippers, said private mediator Sam Kagel.

The committee would set the date of a membership ratification vote and decide if there would be a return to work pending a vote, said Kagel. The committee will meet here Feb. 12.

A new contract would run to July 1, 1973, Kagel said.

When he made the announcement, Kagel was flanked by ILWU President Harry Bridges and President Edmund Flynn of the employer group, the Pacific Maritime Association.

Asked by reporters if he could recommend the agreement to his members, Bridges replied: "I don't want to discuss it now."

Asked if the agreement was the result of White House and congressional pressure, the 70-year-old Bridges gave an emphatic "No."

Flynn said in response to a question, "Yes, sir, we are satisfied with the terms, or we wouldn't have agreed."

Flynn added that the agreement was produced by "a desire on the part of both of us to work out a settlement."

President Nixon had asked Congress to order an end to the strike to dissolve what he contended was a threat to the nation's overall economy.

The Senate had scheduled a session Tuesday to consider such legislation. In the House, a proposal for a 60-day injunction to bring a partial end to the walkout was submitted.

The Senate later approved a measure that would order an end to the strike by compulsory arbitration. The bill sent to the House provides, however, for an end to the arbitration procedure when voluntary settlement of all issues is certified by both sides to the secretary of labor.

Details of the settlement were not immediately disclosed, but Bridges had said earlier that retroactivity of a wage boost already agreed upon was the last major issue to be worked out.

The strike was the longest in the history of West Coast ports and the first since a 95-day walkout in 1948.

President Nixon said the strike cost the United States $600 million in export losses. Some economists put the overall cost at nearly $2 billion.

The walkout idled 24 West Coast ports and choked off shipments to Hawaii.

The strike, called by the ILWU last July 1, ran for 100 days before President Nixon invoked the Taft-Hartley Act to interrupt the work stoppage for an 80-day cooling-off period.

The 80 days ran out on Christmas Day and the union resumed the strike Jan. 17.

When the opposing sides returned to negotiations Jan. 31, Kagel, a veteran negotiator in port labor problems, was called in to assist.

Kagel told Tuesday's news conference: "I am authorized to announce that the ILWU and PMA negotiating committees reached agreement on all economic issues. Certain specific non-economic issues will be mediated and, if necessary, arbitrated by me."

Washington--Harry Bridges, head of the West Coast Dock workers, talked yesterday about the tentative agreement reached ending the Strike. (AP)

Faulkner Dismisses Irish Unity

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) — Prime Minister Brian Faulkner has ruled out any idea of Irish unity as a solution to the violence and bloodshed which has stricken his province.

In an unyielding address to Parliament Tuesday night, he declared: "What we have seen of the Irish republic, we do not like. We do not admire the petulant and bellicose utterances of its public figures on the world stage."

Faulkner spoke as Northern Ireland's Protestant majority, anxious to ward off any weakening in the British fight against the Irish Republican Army, prepared to launch an organization to thwart moves toward a united Ireland.

The Roman Catholic minority, bent on bringing the British province under the rule of the overwhelmingly Catholic Irish republic, singled out Wednesday as "D-Day" in a new civil rights campaign of disruption of civic life and resistance to the Protestant-based government.

In preparation for the 24 hours of protest meetings, hunger vigils and school boycotts, Faulkner's government cancelled all police leave.

The Protestants were planning to launch an organization called Ulster Vanguard.

Rockets Hit DaNang

SAIGON (AP) — Enemy gunners early Wednesday slammed 25 giant rockets into the big U.S. air base at Da Nang and the surrounding city, South Vietnam's second largest.

The allied commands said three Vietnamese civilians were killed and six civilians, one Vietnamese soldier and 10 U.S. servicemen were wounded.

The U.S. Command said there was light damage to the air base but that it was operating. A spokesman, Capt. James d'Entremont, said there was minor damage to one aircraft and light damage to buildings and equipment.

The South Vietnamese government announced Wednesday that allied forces would observe a 24-hour cease-fire for the TET lunar new year celebration beginning at 6 p.m., Saigon time, next Monday.

The Viet Cong had announced last December they would observe a 96-hour cease-fire for TET beginning at 1 a.m., Saigon time, next Monday.

Nixon In Live Radio Broadcast

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon will make a live nationwide radio broadcast Wednesday morning in connection with his voluminous foreign-policy report being sent to Congress, the White House announced Tuesday.

The President will speak from his Oval Office in the White House at 11:05 a.m. EST, prior to signing the foreign-policy report, which sets forth his view of the state of the world at the end of his third year in office.

Pay Board Member Resigns Business Post

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Pay Board member Neil Jacoby resigned Tuesday as chairman of the executive committee of Occidental Petroleum Corp.'s board of directors, saying he wished to "avoid any possible ground for criticism of the Pay Board."

Labor members on President Nixon's Pay Board have said that Jacoby, a public member, should be removed because of his executive ties with Occidental.

Textiles Show Big Trade Deficit

WASHINGTON (AP) — The nation recorded a trade deficit in textiles of almost $2 billion last year, its worst in history, the Commerce Department said Tuesday.

But department officials said the textile deficit should improve this year with the signing of new voluntary agreements with Southeastern Asia countries to limit exports to the United States.

Duane Thomas Indicted

GREENVILLE, Tex. (AP) — Duane Thomas, the Dallas Cowboys running back, was indicted by the Hunt County grand jury Tuesday, along with his younger brother, Bertrand, on charges of possessing marijuana.

They will be arraigned before Judge Hollis Garman Feb. 21 in 196th District Court. Meanwhile their original bail of $5,000 each is continued.

Jurors Chosen In Berrigan Case

HEAD FUN RAISER-Robert Hoyt, bearded former newspaper reporter for a Catholic paper, heads up the Harrisburg Defense Committee which has raised $400,000 for the defense of Rev. Philip Berrigan and six other antiwar activists on trial in Harrisburg, Pa., in complex case involving bombing and kidnapping charges. Hoyt is shown bending over desk listening to committee worker Carmel Fleisher in committee headquarters a few blocks from Federal court where jury selection for trial is under way. (AP)

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP)-A jury of nine women and three men was sworn in Tuesday to try the Rev. Philip Berrigan and six codefendants on charges that they conspired to kidnap presidential aide Henry Kissinger as a gesture of opposition to the Vietnam war.

Jury selection was completed after 2 1/2 weeks of trial, during which prosecution and defense focused on the religious attitudes of prospective jurors, questioning them at length about their views of political activism by priests and nuns.

In addition to Berrigan, two of the defendants are Catholic priests, one is a former priest, one is a nun and another a former nun. The seventh defendant on trial in U.S. District Court here is a Moslem from Pakistan.

The majority of the jury is Protestant. One is a Roman Catholic. There is one black juror.

Three of the women jurors are in their 20s. The eldest member of the panel is a women of about 60 whose four sons all were conscientious objectors. Three of the jurors have relatives who served in Vietnam.

Selection of six alternate jurors was the next order of business before Judge R. Dixon Herman. They will be available throughout the trial in the event one or more of the regular jurors has to drop out for health or other reasons.

The trial of the so-called Harrisburg 7 began Jan. 24. Since then more than 300 prospective jurors were questioned.

Fourty-six survived the initial examination. This number was reduced during the Tuesday session by the use of peremptory challenges, for which no reason need be given. The defense had 28, the government 6.

The defendants are accused of plotting in 1970 to kidnap Kissinger and stage his mock trial as a symbol of the group's opposition to President Nixon's policies in Southeast Asia.

In addition, the indictment accuses the defendants of plotting to blow up heating tunnels in Washington and to raid and vandalize draft offices in several states.

The government charges that the scheming was masterminded by Berrigan from a cell in the federal penitentiary at Lewisburg, Pa., through the use of smuggled letters. He was incarcerated there at the time, beginning a six-tear prison term for destroying draft records. He later was transferred from Lewisburg.

Defendants with the tall, gray-haired priest, are two other Catholic clergymen, the Rev. Joseph Wenderoth, 35, and the Rev. Neil McLaughlin, 30. Also charged are a former priest and the ex-nun he married, Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Scoblick, both 32; Sister Elizabeth McAlister, 30, a teaching nun, and Eqbal Ahmed, 40, a Pakistan graduate student in this country.

All but the 48-year-old Berrigan are free on bond.

Chicago 7 In Court Again

CHICAGO (AP)-Attorneys for the Chicago 7 told a federal appeals court Tuesday that five riot convictions stemming from violence at the time of the 1968 Democratic National Convention should be overturned, arguing that the federal law was unconstitutional and the judge antagonistic.

The lawyers argued that the antiriot section of the Civil Rights Act of 1968, under which the defendants were indicted, violated their clients' First Amendment rights. They also accused U.S. District Court Judge Julius J. Hoffman, who presided at the tumultuous four-month trial, of "blatant antagonism" and favoring the prosecution over the defense.

The oral arguments touched only a fraction of the issues raised in the 547-page appeal brief before three judges of the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Five of the seven defendants were convicted of crossing state lines with the intent to incite rioting, but all were acquitted of conspiracy to do so.

The five convicted defendants were David Dellinger, 56; Thomas C. Hayden, 32; Jerry C. Rubin, 32; Rennard C. Davis, 32, and Abbie Hoffman, 33. They were sentenced to five years in prison and fined $5,000 each.

Two other defendants, Lee Winer and John R. Froines, both 33, were acquitted of all charges in the trial, which ended Feb. 18, 1970.

In addition, all seven defendants plus two defense lawyers were sentenced for contempt by Judge Hoffman at the trial's conclusion. The lawyers, William Kunstler and Leonard Weinglass, are among those arguing for reversal of the convictions.

Rubin and Davis attended the appeals court session. They were joined by Bobby G. Seale, chairman of the Black Panther party, an original defendant who also was held in contempt by Judge Hoffman after a mistrial was declared in his case.

Nixon Claims No Tax Rise

WASHINGTON (AP)-The Nixon Administration Tuesday disavowed any intention of raising taxes in the coming fiscal year while congressional Democrats put pressure on the President to submit loophole-closing tax reform proposals by March 15.

Rep. Wilbur Mills, (D-Ark.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, wrote a letter to Nixon asking him to submit proposals by March 15 for closing loopholes in the federal income, estate and gifts taxes. And he implied that failure to do so could imperil administration requests for further increases in the federal debt ceiling.

Mills' letter came as a compromise with efforts of several House Democrats to hold up a pending $20-billion increase in the federal debt ceiling unless Nixon acted to boost revenues by reforms closing loopholes.

Rep. Henry Reuss, (D-Wis.), who initiated that move, said Mills' move seems to him a happy solution.

George Shultz, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said he believes there should be a "moratorium on increasing revenue by increasing tax rates."

"The administration has no intention of seeking a value-added tax or any kind of tax as it applies to the fiscal 1973 budget," Shultz told the congressional Joint Economic Committee.

He repeated administration requests for congressional spending restraint and for a spending ceiling set at the $246-billion level of the president's budget.

Chiding Congress for what he sees as congressional efforts to tell the President how to run his job, Schultz said increases in defense spending are sought for substantive reasons and not to stimulate the economy.

And he declined to be optimistic when asked to evaluate chances for plugging tax loopholes.

Mayor Yorty Raps Supreme Court

MANCHESTER, N.H. (AP)-Los Angeles Mayor Sam Yorty, a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, called Tuesday night for "a more realistic understanding of police problems by the U.S. Supreme Court."

"Law enforcement can be brought back to its proper perspective only by a growing concern and respect for law and order by the public and a more realistic understanding of police problems by the U.S. Supreme Court," Yorty said in remarks prepared for delivery before law enforcement students at St. Anselm's College.

He said the Los Angeles Police Department is installing what he called a unique computerized emergency communication system. The multi-million dollar system, he said, will be the first of its kind in the nation.

It will show at a glance, he said, the location of every emergency service vehicle in the city. When citizens ask police help, the system can automatically determine proper jurisdiction, select the closest available units and digitally transmit the dispatch order-all within four seconds, Yorty said.

New Hampshire Campaign Picking Up

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Four contenders for the Democratic presidential nomination took their campaigns to New Hampshire Tuesday as the tempo of politicking for the state's March 7 presidential primary picked up.

Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), told the New Hampshire legislature that the United States is "torn by turmoil" comparable to that it faced 200 years ago.

He said he wants to see the nation "first in the world as proof that a society can be free and still be best in education, employment, housing and opportunity-and can relate to all other nations without the taint of arrogance."

Earlier, Hartke said he would introduce legislation that would provide Vietnam veterans with the same benefits now available to veterans of World War II.

The lawmakers also listened to former Massachusetts Gov. Endicott Peabody, who is campaigning for the Democratic vice presidential nomination.

Los Angeles Mayor Sam Yorty and Sens. George McGovern, (D-S.D.), and Edmund Muskie, (D-Maine), were to arrive in New Hampshire Tuesday night to kick off campaign swings through the state.

Robert Philbrick, head of Yorty's campaign here, challenged McGovern to debate his candidate. McGovern had sought to debate Muskie but had indicated he will debate Hartke since Muskie aides say their candidate will be in Florida on Feb. 16, the date proposed for the debate.

Meanwhile, both Muskie and McGovern issued statements supporting a bill which would have the Massachusetts legislature supporting a bill which would have the Massachusetts legislature recorded in support of the Mansfield Amendment to set a date for U.S. withdrawal from Southeast Asia.

Campaigning in Boston before leaving for the New Hampshire tour, McGovern said, "The war cannot continue for a single day without congressional acquiesence."

Muskie, who was to begin his tour in Keene, also issued a statement calling for legislation to help solve confusion among the elderly about medicare.

Although their candidate is not on the New Hampshire ballot, supporters of Rep. Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), stumped the state Tuesday to promote a write-in campaign for the congressman, who is chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Jack Coleman, a candidate for Congress from Arkansas, told an audience in Durham that a ticket headed by Mills with Sen. Edward Kennedy, (D-Mass.), is the only combination that can defeat President Nixon in 1972.

On the Republican side in New Hampshire, William Ruckleshaus, head of the Environmental Protection Agency, began a two-day swing through the state on behalf of President Nixon's primary campaign.

In Massachusetts, Secretary of State John Davoren announed the names of three Republicans and 12 Democrats who will be on the ballot in the state's April 25 primary.

Republicans include Nixon and Reps. Paul N. McCloskey, (R-Cal.), and John Ashbrook, (R-Ohio.)

On the Democratic ballot will be Muskie, McGovern, Hartke, Yorty, Mills, Sens. Hubert Humphrey, (D-Minn), Henry Jackson, (D-Wash.), former Sen. Eugene McCarthy, and Rep. Shirley Chisholm, (D-N.Y.), Mayor John Lindsay of New York, Alabama Gov. George Wallace and Edward Coll, a Connecticut businessman.

The Massachusetts primary law places on the ballot all those candidates or potential candidates "determined to be generally advocated or recognized in national news media throughout the United States."

Coll appeared on the ballot because he filed the 2,500 signatures necessary to get his name listed on the at-large side of the ballot.

Davoren began sending letters Tuesday to all those listed on the ballot, telling them they have until Feb. 15 to file an "affidavit of non-candidacy", as required by state law, if they wish to get their name off the ballot.

So far, only Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., has filed such a disclaimer. Kennedy's affidavit was made Jan. 17.

Meanwhile, Billy Joe Clegg, 43, of Tulsa, Okla., announced that he intended to sue the Massachusetts secretary of state for $1 million for "misrepresentation."

Clegg, who says he is a Democrat, had tried to get on the state's presidential primary ballot under the news media recognition clause of the law.

He said he presented news clippings to Davoren which contained news of his campaign and thus made him a verified candidate, but his name was not on the ballot.

Davoren had no comment at the news conference on Clegg's intention to sue.

Davoren said that comedian Pat Paulsen, whose name is on the New Hampshire primary ballot March 7, was not placed on the Massachusetts' ballot because he was not determined to be a candidate under the news media clause.

Once the Feb. 15 deadline has passed for filing disclaimers, there is no way a candidate may remove his name from the ballot.

"If he decides not to run," Davoren said, "the only thing he can do is tell his people to vote for someone else."

Some of the candidates listed by Davoren also had signatures filed in their behalf. By filing 2,500 signatures candidates may appear at the at-large ballot for convention delegates.

By filing 200 signatures, slates favorable to candidates may get on the ballot in congressional districts.

The Muskie Election Committee Tuesday filed nominating petitions to place 163 delegates and alternates pledged to the Maine Democrat on the ballot.

The Muskie backers are fielding slates statewide and in every district.

State Rep. Marie E. Howe, D-Somerville, filed a slate in the 8th Congressional District for Humphrey.

Commuter Assembly Meeting

Unknown to most commuters, there exists an organization which functions on their behalf, the Commuter Assembly. The reason for this past obscurity was simple. The Commuter Assembly Executive Council, which governs the Commuter Assembly, has lacked both the support of the commuters and internal organization. Hopefully this is all changed.

The Executive Council has eleven members, eight of which were elected at large from the commuter undergrads. They are interested in improving the situation of the commuter at UMass-Amherst. After all, nearly one-third of the undergraduate body commutes. The commuters that elected them thought there was room for improvement for commuters and now the Assembly only needs their time and support.

Thursday, February 18, at five P.M. in rooms 163-167 of the Campus Center there will be a meeting of the Commuter Assembly for all commuters. This is the time for the commuters to give their support to any worthwhile activity they believe will benefit the commuter. Without this support the Commuter Assembly Executive Council is powerless to act on their behalf, and the complaints you have now will be present next year--unless you act.

"Abortion: A Woman's Right To Choose"

The Abortion Waiting Room

By MAUREEN MOISTER

"Abortion Waiting Room" was the theme for a movie and discussion program held in the Campus Center last Thursday.

Between 40 and 50 people, mostly female, crowded into room 905-909 for the first of six presentations shown from 3:00 to 5:00 p.m. The movie was introduced by Lynn Wright, a representative from the Boston Women's Abortion Action Coalition (BOWAAC) who came to UMass along with two other women at the request of two University students, Ellen Ford and Rita Moir.

After showing the film, the BOWAAC representatives answered questions and encouraged the audience to view the charts and posters on the walls. Mimeographed literature was also available on such topics as the female reproductive system, choosing a contraceptive, and WONAAC--the Women's National Abortion Action Coalition.

"BOWAAC is a subdivision of WONAAC," explained BOWAAC representative Donna Robertson, who is also a student at Northeastern University. According to a handout which she cited, WONAAC "was formed at a national conference of more than 1,000 held in New York City in July, 1971. Women from 29 states and 253 organizations came together to unite their efforts in a national fight for the repeal of all anti-abortion laws and for the corollary demands of no forced sterilization and the repeal of restrictive contraception laws."

Ms. Robertson emphasized that WONAAC is more concerned with the laws protecting a woman's right to have an abortion than with keeping the population down. "Whether she wants an abortion, a contraceptive, sterilization, or a hysterectomy, a woman should have the right to choose," she said, reiterating the message on the button she was wearing which proclaimed, "abortion: a woman's right to choose."

To achieve their goals, another handout reads, "WONAAC is based on a program of legislative, judicial and mass demonstration activities on a local and national level."

A BOWAAC newsletter reports that, "About a year ago a group of women decieed to initiate a class action suit against the abortion law of Massachusetts to challenge the state's right to deprive women of the constitutional right to control our own bodies, to determine whether and when to bear children, and to emphasize that what has been too long considered a personal probelm is a woman's affliction." Because, "The attorney general has indicated that the case is invalid without a pregnant woman as a plaintiff," BOWAAC requests in the newsletter that women who do want an abortion volunteer.

Another article states that "on February 7, three proposals to create legal rights for the fetus will be coming before the Massachusetts House and Senate Committees. One proposal would amend the Massachusetts Constitution to include the legal rights of a fetus." In response to this proposal, BOWAAC organized a picket line in front of the State House.

This coming weekend of February 11, 12, and 13, WONAAC is sponsoring a national conference at Boston University to exchange experiences and discuss plans for the future. On Friday, a mass rally is to be held. Saturday will be devoted to workshops on topics including national legislation, court actions, forced sterilization, abortion referral and clinics, attacks from Right to Life, and defending and extending liberalized laws and workshops by constituency--campus, high school, gay women, labor, and Black and Third World women.

"One thing is clear," concludes the BOWAAC newsletter. "--the opponents of abortion have been stepping their activities against women both in New York and nationally. The upcoming February WONAAC conference will provide us with the opportunity to strengthen our movement to deal with these attacks. As we learned in N.Y., unity of everyone concerned will be necessary to give us the political power to remove this powerful stumbling block to the right of women to decide when and if to bear children."

Three Alternatives In Obtaining An Abortion

By JUDY O'SHEA

In a recent MDC interview with Ms. Ethilind Wright who headed the meeting of the Boston Women's Abortion Act Coalition last Thursday at the Campus Center, important information was given concerning the steps to be taken if a woman attending the University should decide to seek an abortion. According to Ms. Wright, a woman has three alternatives: contact the Pregnancy Counseling Service of Boston, contact the Clergy Consultation Service, or to go directly to New York to one of the many abortion clinics.

In Ms. Wright's opinion, the wisest choice would be to contact the Pregnancy Counseling Service of Boston (617-523-1633) where the procedure is relatively simple and takes into consideration the personal problems of the women who seek help. The agency would begin by questioning the woman to make sure she is obtaining an abortion on her own will and would then, considering the woman's age and financial situation, find a suitable clinic where the abortion would take place.

Another benefit of the Pregnancy Counseling Service is that the cost is based on a sliding scale depending on the woman's financial standing. If a woman cannot finance an abortion, the agency will loan the money, which they obtain mainly through contributions from women who have previously borrowed money from the agency. These loans are long termed, and 1 are given with the understanding that some may not be repaid.

Another alternative given by Ms. Wright was to contact the Clergy Consultation Service (413-536-3478), an organization basically the same as the Pregnancy Counseling Service. This agency is run by open-minded ministers and deals with abortions as well as venereal diseases and other problems. The Service will refer a woman to clinics in her own area, or doctors in her own town who will assist her in abortion procedures.

Ms. Wright also added that a woman may go directly to New York to any one of a number of abortion clinics or hospitals, although the cost would be considerably higher. There is also a law which states that women must be eighteeen years of age.

One Method Of Birth Control

(Editor's Note: The following article was found in a medical textbook. It would be interesting to know how many Massachusetts legislators still support this type of birth control.)

"You will need to develop, from the beginning, habits suited to your teaching and consistent with married celibacy and ascetic wedlock. You believe sex expression is sin, except for procreation. If this means four babies in the average twenty five years of married life, you may have occasion for sex union less than twenty five times, perhaps only four or eight times. Therefore:

Beware of anything and everything that might start to rouse sexual desire or excitement, such as any bodily exposure. Arrange for separate rooms and baths, or separate bed, bathing and dressing. If only one bed, then to bed and out again at different times; no cuddling each other on winter nights; no contacts. Don't dress in bedroom except alone.

Cut down all caresses; a kiss is to be perfunctory; holding in arms, rare and brief; no sitting close of evenings. Married love has dangerous opportunities until you become physically completely indifferent to each other."

There will be a women's abortion conference sponsored by the Women's National Abortion Action Coalition (WONAAC) for February 11-13 at Boston University. The preceedings will open with a public rally on Friday, February 11, at 7:30 p.m.

Another alternative given by Ms. Wright was to contact the Clergy Consultation Service (413-536-3478), an organization basically the same as the Pregnancy Counseling Service. This agency is run by open-minded ministers and deals with abortions as well as venereal diseases and other problems. The Service will refer a woman to clinics in her own area, or doctors in her own town who will assist her in abortion procedures.

Ms. Wright also added that a woman may go directly to New York to any one of a number of abortion clinics or hospitals, although the cost would be considerably higher. There is also a law which states that women must be eighteen years of age.

One Method Of Birth Control

(Editor's Note: The following article was found in a medical textbook. It would be interesting to know how many Massachusetts legislators still support this type of birth control.)

"You will need to develop, from the beginning, habits suited to your teaching and consistent with married celibacy and ascetic wedlock. You believe sex expression is sin, except for procreation. If this means four babies in the average twenty five years of married life, you may have occasion for sex union less than twenty five times, perhaps only four or eight times. Therefore:

Beware of anything and everything that might start to rouse sexual desire or excitement, such as any bodily exposure. Arrange for separate rooms and baths, or separate bed, bathing and dressing. If only one bed, then to bed and out again at different times; no cuddling each other on winter nights; no contacts. Don't dress in bedroom except alone.

Cut down all caresses; a kiss is to be perfunctory; holding in arms, rare and brief; no sitting close of evenings. Married love has dangerous opportunities until you become physically completely indifferent to each other."

There will be a women's abortion conference-sponsored by the Women's National Abortion Action Coalition (WONAAC)-for February 11-13 at Boston University. The preceedings will open with a public rally on Friday, February 11, at 7:30 p.m.

Inkpot Reflections

In the last issue of Genesis there appeared a personal reminiscence by one David Hoffman. The entire piece is admirable, quietly reflective, with much to recommend it. What struck me, though, was that he chose to begin by pointing out the coincidence of 1972, and his fresman year, 1960, both being election years. While Dave mentions the fact in order to contrast the hope offered by John F. Kennedy then and the despair offered by Nixon now, the point is that electing a President is considered an act of massive significance. My question is: is it?

When I was younger and given to theorizing about most everything, I had a lovely little theory that a President had the power to bestow his personality on his times. Eisenhower put the country to sleep at the very moment it was falling apart with his goshandgollywhatwasIsayingohyoudon'tremembereither personality. Kennedy had everyone convinced that these were the good times and so what if the Dominican Republic, Bay of Pigs, Laos, and Vietnam were all happening. Johnson made it possible to believe in anything and Nixon restored only our belief in nonbelief. According to the theory, electing Presidents determines our national self-image.

Today I would only laugh if someone else offered me the theory as their own. Such innocent simplicity defies recognition of the lessons of the intervening years. The rock has been overturned, revealing underneath an America far more complex in its difficulties than is equal to the abilities of one man, a politician at that, to correct. That is to say, the effect a President can have for good is much less than Civics teachers believe. Therefore, if we elect a President by the least of all evils theory, believing Him incapable of doing much good, but capable of doing all sorts of evil things, then we have certainly gone beyond any point at which we could be lulled into feelings of security by the new man on the steps of the Capitol as he intones his speechwriter's words, and hears them himself for the first and last time.

Yet in order to get to Inauguration Day, dozens of men with Egos large and Visions small spend millions of dollars convincing America that there are not only new clothes, but a new king as well. This hoax is known as a Presidential campaign. Long on image and short on substance, they generally leave us with a new Harding or Nixon. In the process, America's ills are allowed to fester for twelve months out of every forty-eight months, as Candidates from Maine to California take time out to compete for the title of Chief Healer. In the Seventies the practice of campaigning has expanded to four years for the Incumbent, and two years for the Opposition.

This leaves very little time for governing. A small point admittedly, but it does give at least one taxpayer pause.

What then can be done? I would suggest for this year a moritorium on Democrats, Republicans, and incumbents in general. Those politicians who are sincerely concerned with doing some good can prove this by working four years without title or patronage. Who shall take their place?

America should have leaders who reflect our most cherished principles. I therefore nominate, for President and Vice-President, Pete Rozelle and Ed McMahon. Shalom.

Glass Menagerie

Every other Thursday afternoon, an odd collection of teachers and administrators gather in Herter Hall to decide your academic fate. They are the ones who decide what courses will be taught, how you will be graded, when you will have your vacation, how (and whether) students will participate in deciding academic matters, and a host of other issues that directly affect us all. The still undecided issue of student participation on the Athletic Council is only the most recent example of a Faculty Senate power.

The deans, vice chancellors, and the chancellor are all there, along with professors elected by the various academic departments. Although there are more than 100 members, only about one half actually attend. In one corner of the room, in their place, are the half-dozen students who are allowed to attend as a "courtesy." The presiding officer is quick to point out that student attendance is a "privilege" that can be unilaterally revoked at any time. These few students can speak on issues only if no "real" Faculty Senator wishes to speak and only if the presiding officer sees fit to notice them.

The Faculty Senate is one of the few remaining vestiges of the notion that academic questions are the sole responsibility of the teacher. According to that notion, students should just sit there and gratefully receive the wisdom from on high.

Presumably these professors have a great deal of experience that gives them the credentials to decide questions of university policy without the benefit of students. We are, after all, naive and hopelessly idealistic. But one Faculty Senate meeting is enough to convince you of the truth of Ambrose Bierce' quip: "Experience is a revelation in the light of which we renounce the errors of youth for those of age."

Senators stand and deliver long orations on the most trivial of issues. Or they make intense value-judgements behind a facade of objective inquiry. In short, they are like any other deliberative assembly. It is their pretense that is maddening. At least the Student Senate acknowledges its occasional buffoonery.

It is highly unlikely that students and faculty will soon be sitting together in a University Senate. The faculty is simply unwilling to voluntarily give up its power over our lives.

But if genuine academic reform is to begin on campus, we must direct our efforts toward the Faculty Senate.

And there is hope. Many members of that body know it for what it is. They are working hard to give students the voice they deserve on university councils, and to change the form and content of learning on campus.

But for the most part, the Faculty Senate shares the archaic attitudes common among administrators several years ago. Administrators have at least begun to learn that they can ignore student pressure only at the risk of our angry protests.

Someday, just perhaps, all members of the university will recognize that a university is a mutual enterprise of students and faculty. Perhaps also, the faculty will learn that undergraduate students deserve to control their own education.

I am not optimistic. But if the faculty fails to learn, the lesson for students will be that reform is hopeless, and that other alternatives must be sought. If students learn that lesson, then the true purpose of the university will be realized.

The Klein Papers

WASHINGTON–I have just received a top secret document which makes the Pentagon and Anderson papers look as innocent as Erich Segal's "Love Story." Although it may compromise this nation's security and give aid and comfort to our enemies, I feel obligated to reveal the contents so the public will know what is really going on in the Administration.

The document was authored by Herb Klein, President Nixon's director of communications, and was xeroxed and hand-delivered to me in my office by someone who, for the moment, cannot be identified.

The title of the document, which is 33 pages long, is "Richard Nixon's Third Year."

In the introduction Klein writes, "In the year now ending President Nixon moved vigorously on both the foreign and domestic fronts to strengthen the foundations for a generation of peace in the world and for a new prosperity without war and without inflation here in the United States."

This blockbuster is followed by Klein's revelation that "it was a year of bold initiatives including the new economic policies launched on Aug. 15, with the wage-price freeze, job creating tax stimuli and measures to bring about a reformation of the international monetary system and a fairer trading break for American goods–and thus for American workers–in the world's markets."

The Klein papers say that the Nixon Administration has given hope to the young as well as the old, and advances in "housing, in public transportation, in crime control, in education, all contributed toward making our communities more livable."

As if this weren't damaging enough, Klein went on to say that for Nixon 1971 "was a year of large conceptions, of daring innovation and substantial progress–a year of bold action based on meticulous preparation (The italics are mine). It was a good year that promises much for those to follow."

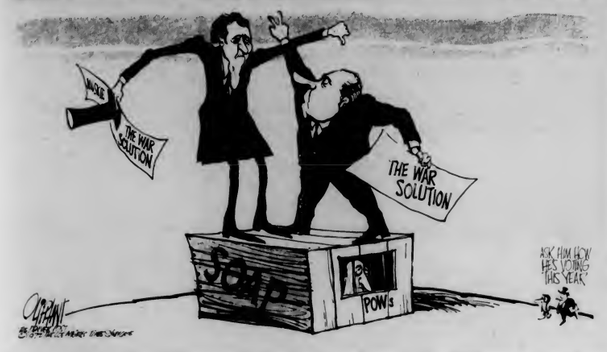
Why Herb Klein would attack the Administration in this manner is not clear. There has been some talk that he was disenchanted with the role has has been asked to play in the White House, but it doesn't explain such virulent disclosures as the fact that under President Nixon employment was increasing strongly, the rate of inflation was being slowed and "that there was growing confidence that the stubborn economic problems generated by the inflation of the late 1960s were being solved."

Throwing caution to the wind Klein said President Nixon was responsible for crime rates being down and rehabilitation rates of criminals up.

Klein also charged the Nixon Administration with providing more people with food stamps, advancing the cause of school desegregation and appointing more black ambassadors, black generals and black admirals (one) than ever before.

The President was also given credit in the Klein papers for reducing highway deaths and pollution and promising a great future for the farmers in 1972.

As far as foreign relations went, there wasn't one place on the globe where President Nixon hadn't made substantial progress.



To read the section on foreign affairs, things are so rosy that one is surprised to discover that the President was also increasing our aerial and sea superiority.

Not since Jack Valenti attacked Lyndon Johnson has an aide at the White House seen fit to write such a frank and honest appraisal of an American President.

The memorandum was obviously written for limited circulation in the White House and never meant to be seen by the press. But someone in the Administration has seen fit to distribute it to the press.

I have the Klein papers in my office right now, and if John Mitchell's Justice Department wants to do anything about it, I'm willing to stand trial. At the risk of going to jail I believe the public has a right to know what Nixon's public relations people are saying about him.

Letters To The Editor

Stomachs Are Growling

(Editor's Note: The following is a copy of a letter sent to Joel Stoneham, Director of Food Services, in an effort to better the present system.)
Dear Mr. Stoneham,

We realize that there are certain drawbacks inherent in any institutional food service. In the past we have lived with them hoping that things will get better. We greeted the arrival of the "New Food Services" with great expectations. However, the "New Food Services" is no better than the old food services, it is in fact somewhat worse. Is it too much to expect food that doesn't result in acne and diarrhea. We have no personal grievences with you, Mr. Stoneham; but throught neglect you are fostering a cruel disservice to the children of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. In Soutwest one of the more obvious manifestations of the "New Food Service" was the appearance, in the place of what had been a very busy dining commons line, an eatery of the McDonald's-Drummer Boy genre. This apparition replaced the little Hatch in serving Southwest. The little Hatch was abandoned. One dining commons line was dismantled. This new liability affords us inferior food, inferior service, a clinical atmosphere and new vistas in the sphere of space wastage. We lose a small fortune in self liquidating restaurant equipment and the use of a needed dining commons line. This loss of a highly used line puts an excessive burden on all the other lines in Southwest. Every student in Southwest is suffering by standing in excessively, ridiculously and unnecessarily long lines. We realize that the students are an undue burden on the food services and without us the food services would run very smoothly. But is it too much to expect a few things from the food services? Is it too much to expect to be treated approximately like human beings? We claim certain inalienable rights as human beings.....

we claim the right of not having to examine all silverware to guard against those common and no doubt infectious morsels of food so often found on them;

we claim the right of not to have to dry the grease off our chicken, pork and beef;

we claim the right to a varied menu;

we claim the right to FRESH fruit and vegetables;

warm food when available;

and canned fruit a little less vintage.

In short, Mr. Stoneham, we as students at the University have to survive and function using University facilities. The dining commons is not making that task an easy one. We challenge any University official to take on that task; they very uncomfortably ate with us at Christmas dinner (wasn't it a coincidence that the meal wasn't too bad that night). Since the benefits of the food services are forced upon us we feel that the people involved with the forcing, namely the food services management, concern themselves with the needs of the people that they are serving and the quality of that service. We feel that they are failing in this.

Sincerely yours,

Cause And Effect

(Ed. Note-This letter withdraws the Valley Peace Center's invitation to Senator Gravel to speak in Amherst because of his endorsement of Edmund Muskie.)
Dear Mr. Johnson:

When we first invited Senator Gravel to come to Amherst, last September, we were eager to meet with him because of his outrage at the administration's contempt of the people as shown by the contents of the Pentagon Papers and the crude attempt to suppress their publication. And when finally, in early January, a mid-February date for his appearance was nearly settled, we felt that his leadership in the fight against the draft, for which we were also grateful, would make him a fitting and attractive advocate for student voter registration.

But now we are dismayed at Senator Gravel's endorsement of a candidate who can temporize while the United States is killing the people and destroying the land of Indochina, a candidate whose moral sense is expediency and whose conscience is ambition and who thereby expresses his own contempt for the people--American and Indochinese. Supporting Muskie's candidacy has cost Senator Gravel his effectivenss: for a great many students, Edmund Muskie epitomizes the time-serving politician who for them has discredited the electoral process.

Because of his endorsement of Edmund Muskie, the Executive Board of the Valley Peace Center has asked me to withdraw its invitation. We regret the necessity for this withdrawal as deeply as we regret the cause.

Very truly yours,
Nonny Burack

Out Of Mind

To the Editor:

About sixty years ago, the State of Massachusetts appropriated enough funds to physically construct the "Belchertown State School for the Feebleminded." This school (in name only) was situated just far enough away from Boston to allow the legislatures to forget their human creation of this inhuman institution. Another legislative example of out of sight, out of mind.

Since its conception thousands of men and women have been incarcerated there, and slowly stripped of their humanity. Just a few examples of the inhuman treatment might include; the forcing of thirty to forty people to be herded into one bedroom, forcing people to defecate in toilets that have no toilet seats, forcing people to live under the constanct scrutiny of attendants, and, worse yet, providing such inadequate training that they cannot escape this nightmare and thus find their way back into society.

The recent judicial actions by the Friends of Belchertown Assoc. against the Department of Mental Health can falsely lead one to hope that some revolutionary changes will be forthcoming. Naturally we all hope so! Other recent attempts to eradicate these inhumanities, however, have failed to provoke any lasting or widespread changes. Last year's pictorial expose in the Springfield Union only led to the dismissal of its instigator and to the creation of a few token programs which seemed to pacify the public and soothed the conscience of today's "concerned" legislatures. Thus the appalling physical conditions and the widespread human abuse and neglect continue.

The Friends of Belchertown are to be congratulated for their long coming insistence on equal rights for the retarded. To compliment their actions, however, everyone who has visited Belchertown and experienced, first hand, its deviencies from normalcy should also become involved. No longer can we visit Belchertown, interact with its people, and quietly return to our comfortable rooms. The inhumanities of this snakepit must be kept alive if the courts and the legislature are to act.

The public must be made aware, or made more aware that human atrocities are occurring every day, only fifteen miles away! Speak out with editorials, articles, letters, or any other way that you see fit to defend the rights of those who are unable to defend themselves.

Howard C. Shane

Editorial Points

Could the recent Yankee Conference ruling on "scholarships by need" lead to the end of the Yankee Conference itself? This is a possibility, as rumors are flying that some schools want to drop out of the conference because of it.

Judging by last night's concert in the Student Union, free concerts have great drawing power, but lesser known names create little or no violence?

It's Not A Pipe Dream

To the Editor:

We, being local people who are fed up with the continuous police abuse of ourselves and our neighbors, hereby announce the formation of a Bill of Rights Committee for our protection. Here is our program:

Compensation for Police Abuse

The last straw hat that caused us to get ourselves together was a plain violation of the constitutional rights of John Miller on October 31, 1971 by Amherst Patrolman Montleon. We have set out the facts of this incident in our Report on Police Abuse attached hereto.

In search of adequate compensation for the pending criminal prosecution. John Miller, with the support and assistance of the Bill of Rights Committee, has presented summons' for service against the arresting officer, and the Town of Amherst. This begins his civil suit to recover money damages. The suit is thru Harry Miles, attorney for the Bill of Rights Committee.

Secondly, the Bill of Rights Committee acting on behalf of John Miller has filed a complaint with the Civilian Review Commission of the Town of Amherst which has an ombudsman capacity as yet untested in the area of Police abuse. We will seek redress in the form of a Commission recommendation that Edward Montleon be fired from the force.

Proposal for Community-Controlled Police

We are hip that the Miller case is the first time that the local police abuse of young people is being brought out into the broad light of day. This breaks the "liberal" crust this community prides itself on. (See Report to the Town of Amherst, citizens Review Commission, November 1, 1969.)

This takes nerve. And we don't mean to stop here. So we are presenting our "Proposal for Community Controlled Police Departments for the Town of Amherst and the Univ. of Mass."

Community controlled police departments are not "pipe dreams," because (1) of the unusual concentration of young potential voters in this town, and because (2) of the tremendous political pressure students can bring to bear on the Chancellor of the University, Mr. Bromery. The resulting political pressure on the County Prosecutor Callahan to keep hands off our business would also be impressive. To a lesser extent we could control the presence of Federal narcs by making Amherst hostile territory.

Documenting Police Abuse

In order to demonstrate how common police abuses are locally, we shall write a book documenting the instances when the police and other officials have abused us. Get in touch with us and tell us your story, major or minor, so we can print it. Some chapters in our "book" will be Drug Busts, Street Abuses, Station House Abuses, Courtroom Violations, Maltreatment and Total Mess-Overs.

Future Plans

Depending on the success of our 3-point program above, we will be planning for (1) criminal defenses for future police abuses. (2) More civil suits for damages and injunction of police malpractices. (3) Massive voter registration and (4) political action within and without the system to gain community control of the police.

Fourth. A helping hand extending to all persons within the community including guests and passers-by.

Drug Policy. The policy of the community government should be to enforce no law making the use or sale of any drug a criminal offense.

(a) When drug use is a problem it is a health problem so the local government should provide medical and social services for users who voluntarily seek assistance.

(b) No controls should be placed on the sale of marijuana and o her natural psychedelics.

(c) The community should explore what controls, if any, should be put on the sale of clean synthetic psychedelics and "hard" drugs.

(d) The community should devise non-criminal controls to stop a person from dealing an adulterated drug especially one containing poison.

7. Review of Criminal Complaints. The Police Affairs Board (see proposal #1 above) should review at a public hearing any protest by a defendant to a criminal complaint against him. In the case of a complaint filed by a police officer, the decision by the Board whether the complaint should be prosecuted is final.

In a case of a complaint filed by a private person, the decision of the Board whether the complaint should be prosecuted is advisory to the complaining person and the District Attorney.

8. A Unified Community Police Department. The University of Massachusetts should contract with the Town of Amherst for police services which are controlled by all residents within the Town.

9. Hometown Court. A Hometown Court for all criminal and civil matters should be established in the Town of Amherst with local judges including non-lawyers appointed for a two-year term of office. The jury list of local people should reflect the various local populations proportionately.

10. Hometown Penalty Program. In the case of actual wrongdoing the wrongdoer should pay a penalty of which jail is the last resort. Penalties should generally compensate the victim for the wrong done.

This proposal presented by the Bill of Rights Committee.

Edited: John Miller

Northampton Volunteers Need Your Help Now

The Northampton Volunteers are an organization of students at the Five Colleges who are interested in the problems of the mentally ill and who devote at least two hours weekly to working with patients in the Northampton State Hospital.

Within the hospital they help to resocialize residents and to supplement programs such as the occupational therapy programs. Residents of the hospital greatly appreciate the visits of the volunteers, and the hospital administration recognizes the importance of the volunteer activities as a supplement to the hospital's therapy and counselling programs, which are limited by a lack of funds and by a badly imbalanced staff/patient ratio.

Although the program comes highly recommended to students majoring in psychology, sociology, and education, the program is unrestricted and requires only dedication and regular attendance of the volunteers. Those who do come regularly realize not only that they have contributed constructively to the community and to the individuals whom they have worked with, but also that they have learned extensively about mental illness.

The first meeting scheduled for the volunteers this semester is Wednesday, February 9. Orientation for new volunteers is scheduled for Wednesday, February 23, and a talent show is being planned for presentation early in March. The busses leave Hasbrouck Lab and Patterson House at 6:30 in the evening, arrive at the hospital for the 7 to 9 visiting hours, and return to campus at 9:30. For further information about the program, call Sue at 5-0320 (house phone), or Brian, 6-6373.

Robber Shaves Off Moustache For Judge

BOSTON (AP) — William Gilday, Jr., 42, came back to court Tuesday without the moustache which Superior Court Chief Justice Walter H. McLaughlin ordered him to shave off.

Gilday is on trial for murder in the slaying of Boston Patrolman Walter Schroeder, shot to death when he responded to a holdup alarm at a Brighton branch bank.

Gilday had said he would defy the order McLaughlin gave him last week in Suffolk Superior Court to get rid of the moustache he grew in the last couple of months while awaiting trial.

The order was on the motion of the prosecution, which argued that Gilday's bushy moustache amounted to a disguise. The state argued he should appear as he was at the time of his arrest, so that witnesses will not be confused in identification.

Four other persons are under indictment with Gilday in the slaying of the policeman and the robber of $26,000 from the bank.

Two of them, Stanley R. Bond, 26, of Cambridge, and Robert J. Valeri, 21, of Somerville, are in custody and are to be tried later.

Culturnatives

A Unique Suggestion For Summer Jobs

By GILBERT J. SALK

The problem of survival is one which is common to all of us, and most of us, I suppose, would like to arrange for our survival with a minimum of distasteful effort. That is not to say that we shouldn't, or don't want to, work, but that we would like our work to be something which has some real meaning in terms of our own skills, needs, values, and interests.

Unfortunately, in terms of rewardable behavior in today's america, most of us find it nearly impossible to gain real satisfaction from the work we do to ensure our survival. As a result, we frequently spend the great majority of our time doing something we don't like in order to be able to spend our free time (providing we're not too tired or depressed from working) enjoying ourselves.

Personally, that's just not the way I want to spend my life. So I've sort of dedicated myself to finding ways of getting bread for doing things I want to do, and looking for new ways to locate and obtain cheapies and freebees. I'd like to pass some of them on to you, and ask you for some help on a scheme I have. (Fair trade?)

I'm a book freak. There is no other materialistic thing which has more value to me. So, finding some way to get books without laying out a lot of bread is important. The "need" reached a crisis point a little over a year ago while I was drooling over all the books reviewed in the Whole Earth Catalog. If I bought every book in there that I wanted, it would have cost over a thousand dollars.

It hit me that book reviewers get complimentary copies from publishers, and that if I could start reviewing books I would have a new access to books without having to lay out a lot of money. That was actually the birth of this column. I had my head into alternative life styles anyway, so I figured that I could do a series of articles on cultural alternatives and incorporate reviews of relevant books.

It worked. I hit the Collegian with the idea, of the column, they liked it, and I started writing. I also wrote to the publishers of all the books in WEC that I wanted, telling them that I was doing the column and that I would be reviewing books. I asked them to send review copies of the books I wanted. About half of them responded favorably, and I now have a great culturnatives library. And, on occassion, I review some of the books and send copies of the reviews to the publishers, so they'll keep sending new books.

The point of all this is that you can do the same thing. You don't have to limit yourself to books. Record companies send out tons (literally) of review copies of all kinds of music. If you have a hobby of some sort, try to find a way to get a regular column about it into a newspaper, and send copies to suppliers as a means of getting free samples. You're limited only by your imagination and you willingness to write the articles and locate a newspaper.

The above is just a handy dodge. More important is finding some way to have fun making money. The first thing to do is figure out what it is that you want to do. Then figure out who might be willing to pay you to do it. Don't limit yourself to the things you've been "educated" to do by UMass. Most of us have interests which aren't dealt with by the formal education machines we're programmed through. We've had to educate ourselves. Examples might be photography, fishing, ecology, helping other people, or some other interest. For example, I make my money now by coordinating Draft Conseling Services here on campus. The job lets me help people out of the draft, actively and usefully fight against the war machine, teach people more about themselves and the institutions working to control their lives, and rap with some of the finest folks on campus. The world is full of church groups, liberal agencies, foundations, stores selling handicrafts, people needing services and/or advice, and anything else you might have to offer. Do some exploring to see what the world can do for you–you might get a pleasant surprise.

Now, I could use some help. One thing about writing is that you have no idea who reads what you put in the paper–there's no interaction. So asking a favor feels kind of strange. But I'm fearless.

I'd like to try to sell this column to some other newspapers. My guess is that some of you either have relatives or friends who are in the newspaper or publishing business. If you're a fairly regular reader, and you like the column, why not talk to them and find out if they'd like to carry it in their papers. I could provide you with copies of earlier columns to show them, and you could tell them what you like about CULTURNATIVES. If the column turns you on, why not help spread the audience?

If you want to help, stop in at 923 CC and let's rap a bit. I'd appreciate it.

PEACE.

Pageant For The Eyes Presented

Kathleen Childs, a student at the University of Massachusetts, is the first contestant to enter the Miss Northampton Scholarship Pageant.

A 1970 graduate of Northampton High School, Miss Childs is the first of an ancipated 15 applicants who will compete in the Pageant to be held on March 3 at Northampton High School under the sponsorship of the Northampton Kiwanis Club.

The contest is open to all girls within Hampshire County who are between the ages of 18 and 28, a high school graduate by September of this year, and a resident of Hampshire County for the past six months or an area college student.

Miss Childs, 19, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Childs of 12 Fruit St., Northampton. Working part-time at McCallum's, Kathleen began her studies at UMass. last semester and hopes to major in psychology or sociology.

The winner of the Miss Northampton Pageant will enter the Miss Massachusetts Pageant to be conducted this spring at Attelboro, Mass.

Pageant Chairman Philip Sullivan said that application forms are available at Daniel's Store, Hotel Northampton, Kresconko Photography Studio, the Greater Northampton Chamber of Commerce office, Williamsburg Snack Bar, and by mail from Northampton Kiwanis Club, Box 301, Northampton, Mass.

Auto Pool On The Road

By KERRY MELLO

An outstretched thumb is a common sight around campus and with the sub-freezing weather of late that position sometimes becomes permanent. Even when the thermometer hits a sub-tropical 30° the prospect of no ride isn't very encouraging. However, with the creation of the auto pool prospects are a bit brighter.

The auto pool is a project of the Student Senate and is maintained by the student transit system, who also run the campus busses. The pool contains two cars and a bus which could be used by any campus R.S.O. group at the cost of ten cents per mile. The money obtained from this venture would be used by the senate to pay for fuel, insurance and maintenance of the cars. For S.A.T.S. groups, the senate will allocate funds for gas at the beginning of the semester and will then collect from that group the usual ten cents per mile. In this way the senate can control the number of times the car is used without charge.

This new system was introduced because of frequent trouble concerning the old cars which the senate owned.

Veterans Receive Service Credit

Veterans who attend the UMass may now in most cases, receive some academic credit for their service experience.

According to Registrar Ralph D. Jones, students who have military service of six months to one full year, including the completion of basic or recruit training, may be accepted as meeting the requirements of military science at the freshman and sophomore levels (four credits), and the veteran will be considered as meeting the physical education requirements of the freshman and sophomore levels. This is provided that the applicant's military service was of more than one year's duration and that these credits will satisfy the UMass physical education requirements.

In addition, credit may be given to veterans who have attended certain military schools while in the service. Diplomas or certificates of training for courses completed must be submitted to the registrar's office as proof of completion of such training.

Credit may also be given for on the job training received in the service. However the veteran must request the related academic department to examine his knowledge or skills in that area.

Faculty To Advise Ife University

Three UMass faculty have been named to a Consortium Committee to help the development of the Institute of Administration of the University of Ife (UNIFE) in Nigeria. (Ife is pronounced Ee-fay.)

The three, appointed by UMass-Amherst Acting Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery, are John W. Lederle, former UMass president and now professor of political science; Professor John H. Foster, director of the Center for International Agricultural Development; and Professor Simon Rottenberg, head of the economics department.

The three from UMass will join three from the University of Connecticut and three from the University of Ife in advising and evaluating the programs now under way at the Nigerian institute, located in Ibadan.

The UNIFE project continues a long tradition of University assistance to education in developing countries, beginning in 1878 with sponsorship of the College of Agriculture in Hokkaido, Japan, and more recently through Agency for International Development (AID) projects in Malawi and Uganda.

The Universities of Connecticut and Massachusetts have jointly undertaken a four-year project, funded by AID, Nigeria, to provide staffing for in-service training courses at the institute of Administration in Ibadan. A series of four-month courses is planned, in each of which 30 Nigerian civil servants and representatives of industry will receive training in the preparation, evaluation, and management of development projects. Nigerian case materials will be used.

One faculty member from here, Professor John H. Bragg, of the department of agriculture and food economics, and two from the University of Connecticut arrived in Nigeria last October, and will staff the program for the first two years. Six Nigerian faculty will come to the United States for doctoral study and will be phased into the program during the second two years to replace the American faculty by the end of the fourth year.

Work With Wood

Practical applications of kiln drying were stressed at a five-day workshop for furniture and lumber company personnel presented recently by the UMass wood science and technology program.

Program participants came from Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio and Vermont for the workshop, conducted by the staff of the wood science and technology program of the UMass Forestry department in cooperation with the New England Kiln Drying Association and the U.S. Forest Service.

UMass Professor William W. Rice, director of the workshop, said, "The idea was to promote better drying practices within the wood industry through the practical training of people directly responsible for manufacturing properly seasoned wood products. Sales and management personnel in the course gained background information about wood and moisture relationships and production problems which will allow them to do a better job in procuring dry material, understanding manufacturing processes, and improving customer service."

In addition to learning basic operational techniques, those attending learned ways to improve yield and to increase production.

Assisting Rice were Harold B. Gatslick, R. Bruce Hoadley, and William S. McNamara, all of the UMass wood science and technology program.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

A reader from Paulsboro, N.J., relates experiences which reveal that many social workers are born under Libra. Conducting her own survey, she discovered that numerous "caseworkers" were Librans and that many persons interested in the field were born from Sept. 23 to Oct. 22. This may have something to do with an innate ability of Libra -the ability to administer tender, loving care.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Travel, communications, philosophy--these are stressed. Think and analyze. Don't take others for granted. Otherwise, you could be in for rude awakening. Leo and Aquarius persons figure prominently.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Emotions tend to dominate. Express yourself, but don't play games. Important relationships are at stake. Member of opposite sex speaks mind. Be receptive and sympathetic. Recognize yourown shortcomings.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Lie low. Play waiting game. Let others show their hands. Emphasis on partnership, marriage, ventures which require aid, cooperation of another. Your own judgment now is not as sharp as usual. Take your time.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You get better ideas of position, of where you stand. Pisces person could play significant role. Relative in transit may make special request. Do what you can without being foolish. Remember personal responsibilities.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Creative endeavors spell success. Shake off lethargy. There will be opportunity for greater freedom. Use it wisely. Make necessary changes. Be flexible. Personal magnetism soars. Opposite sex is drawn to you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Home, property, basic security are major points. Finish projects. Don't attempt to prolong situation. Conclusion is necessary. Protect assets. Don't give up something of value for nothing.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Accent on short journey. Ideas which can be developed. Sell concepts through enthusiastic approach. Versatility and humor make fine twin allies. Leo can aid in creative project. Get together.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Hunch leads to ultimate profit. You gain by sharing knowledge. One who knows much is willing to give you a boost. Aquarius plays prominent role. Spotlight on collecting needed material.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Improve appearance. Brighten surroundings. More persons now become aware of you. Know this and act accordingly. No time to hide light. Circumstances favor personal efforts. Mount offensive.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Work quietly, behind scenes. Maintain low profile. Collect facts. Analyze and utilize special information. Refuse to be rushed. Set your own pace. Visit one who may be confined to home, hospital.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Exchange information. Opportunity exists to transform hopes, wishes to realities. Cooperate with Scorpio individual. Pleasant surprise is due. Extend hand of friendship. Be more flexible.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): You get back on right track. Goal is focused and you see clearly. Cooperation indicated from one in position of authority. Family backs you. Situation is such that you are grateful. Much pressure is removed.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you will be doing more traveling than usual. You are capable of settling, counseling, breaking down communication barriers. Social life accelerates. In August, you could receive reward for contacts, efforts. You are due to get started on meaningful relationship.

Olympic Roundup

SAPPORO, Japan (AP)-One of the United States' demon women speed skaters, Dianne Holum, goes for the gold, and the surprising Yankee hockey team squares off in a showdown with the Soviet Union Wednesday in the 11th Winter Olympics Games.

America's other hopes look dim in a full day of activity on the ice rinks and snow slopes of Sapporo. Medals will be decided in the rugged biathlon, postponed a day because of a near blizzard, and the women's 5-kilometer cross country ski race. The first of two runs will be staged in the men's giant slalom, with the second scheduled Thursday.

The final compulsory figures will be skated in men's singles, with top U.S. hopes well back of the leader and medal favorite, Ondrej Nepela of Czechoslovakia, the world champion.

Tuesday was a medal-less day for the United States as 17-year-old Marie Therese Nadig of Switzerland captured her second gold medal in the ladies' giant slalom and Russia's world champions, Irina Rodnina and Alexei Ulanov, led a 1-2 Soviet finish in the dramatic pairs figure skating event.

Miss Rodnina and Ulanov, who reportedly no longer speak to each other because Irina has rejected her partner for another romance, gave a dazzling exhibition before a sellout crowd of 10,000 at the indoor Makomanai Rink.

Ludmila Smirnova and Andrei Souaikin won the silver medal while the bronze went to a spectacular East German pair, Manuela Gross, only 15, and Uwe Kagelmann, 21.

The U.S. national champions, blonde Jo Jo Starbuck and Ken Shelley of Downey, Calif., had to settle for fourth place.

Another U.S. pair, the Long Island school kids, Melissa Militano, 16, and her brother, Mark, 17, of Dix Hills, N.Y.-drew the loudest ovation of all for their imaginative peasant costumes and stirring performance, but drew disappointing markings from the nine judges.

The judges were roundly booed by the crowd.

The figure-skating medals boosted the Russian total to seven, including three golds, three silvers and a bronze. East Germany, has nine, with three golds, two silver and four bronze. The United States is well down the list with two bronze, won by figure skater Janet Lynn of Rockford, Ill., and skier Susan Corrock of Ketchum, Idaho.

American performances, disappointing so far in both figure skating and Alpine skiing, are expected to pick up when U.S. women speed skaters start taking the ice.

Miss Holum, of Northbrook, Ill., who was just 16 when she shared a silver medal with two teammates in the 500 and won the bronze in the 1,000 at Grenoble in 1968, is one of the favorites in Wednesday's 1,500 meter test.

Her chief rivals are Atje Keulen-Deelstra of the Netherlands and Nina Statkevich of the Soviet Union. The United States also will be represented by Leah Poules and Connie Carpenter, both of Northbrook.

The hockey game between the United States and Russia is certain to jam the 10,000 capacity of the Makomanai covered rink.

After losing to Sweden in the Class A round robin, the youthful, hand-checking Americans stormed back to upset Czechoslovakia 5-1. The Russians, meanwhile, had their reputation tarnished by a 3-3 tie with Sweden.

"The boys have really got their tails up," said Murray Williamson, the American coach.

The well-conditioned, precision-skating Russians have won the Olympic title the last two times but Americans still remember the historic U.S. upset for the gold at Squaw Valley, Calif., in 1960.

Rick Chaffee of Rutland, Vt., and Bob Cochran of Richmond, Vt., are given the best chances of the Americans in the men's giant slalom although Europeans are favored.

The downhill winner, Bernhard Russi of Switzerland, is not entered. The top contenders are Gustavo Thoeni of Italy, Jean-Noel Augert and Edmun Bruggmann of Switzerland.

Two Russians are favored in the women's 5-kilometer cross country. They are Galink Koulakova and Alevtina Olunina. U.S. entries include Allison Owen of East Wenatchee, Wash.; Martha Rockwell of Providence, R.I.; Barbara Britch and Marie Mahoney, both of Anchorage, Alaska.

A Russian, Alexandr Tikhonob, also is expected to take the gold in the biathlon, a 20-kilometer test of cross-country skiing and shooting from prone and standing positions.

U.S. biathlon representatives, conceded little hope, including Jay Bowerman, Jr., of Eugene, Ore., son of the U.S. Olympic track coach; Peter Karns of Jackson, Wyo.; Dennis Donahue of Essex Junction, Vt., and Dexter Morse, Aspen, Colo.

U.S. men skaters are not expected to improve their position markedly in the final compulsory figures but undoubtedly will rally in Friday's free-skating final-a specialty of daring and imagination in which they excel.

Nepela had a lead over Patrick Pera of France after three of six compulsories with Sergei Tchetveroukhin of Russia third. Shelley, doing double duty, was fourth for the best U.S. placing with John Mischa Petkevich of Great Falls, Mont., a disappointing sixth and Gordie McKellen of Reading, Pa., 11th.

Miss Nadig emerged as the women's individual star of the games as she swept down the 1,240-meter snaking giant slalom course with its 51 gates in 1 minute, 29.90 seconds for her second gold medal.

Annemarie Proell of Austria, the reigning World Cup champion, had to be content with second again-she also trailed Miss Nadig in the ladies' downhill-with teammate Wiltrud Drexel third.

Gymnasts Travel To Springfield

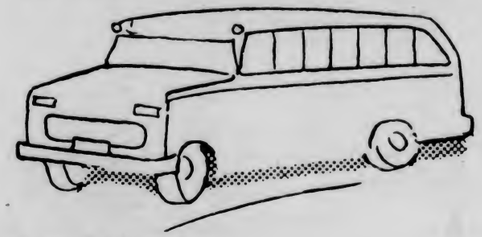
MICHAEL CUSACK

Last March the UMass varsity gymnasts, travelled to Boston State for the New England Gymnastic Championships. In the hours of competition that ensued, the one question in everybody's mind was whether or not UMass could come back and top Springfield College, their arch rivals. Springfield had soundly defeated the Redmen in League competition earlier in the year, and hoped to outscore the Redmen once again, with the New England title at stake. Although UMass put on a good team effort, their showing was in vain, as Springfield won the title with a 157.3-157.1 victory. Springfield's team left Boston State with the title, and knowing they would meet the Redmen again.

Tonight at 8 p.m., the Redmen and the Chiefs will clash again. Needless to say, UMass will be looking for a victory when they travel to Springfield's fieldhouse. Both teams have had their lineup reshuffled in order to produce their potentially highest score. This meet should prove to be the closest to date for both squads.

Redmen coach Erik Kjeldsen reports that, "on paper, the meet couldn't figure to be any closer than it is now." If the top score for each man in Springfield's lineup are added, their team total is 153.5. Likewise, if the best scores to date for the UMass gymnasts are totalled, the outcome is also 153.5. The outcome for the meet will depend on which team can perform better under pressure, because there will be plenty of it. In addition to the tremendous pressure, the Redmen will be at a disadvantage in competing away. Gymnastic meets at Springfield are always packed with enthusiastic fans. It makes a big difference on any team's performance as it is always easier to perform better when the crowd is with you.

U.S. Boxers KO'd



MOSCOW (AP)-The Soviet Union boxing team pounded out an 8-2 victory Tuesday night over the U.S. amateur boxing team with only middleweight Marvin Johnson and heavyweight Duane Bobick scoring American victories.

Bobick, 21, of Bowlus, Minn., won a second-round TKO over Vladimir Chernyshev when the referee stopped the bout with the Russian bleeding from a cut over his left eye and Bobick scoring heavily with both hands to the head.

Johnson, 17, of Portsmouth, Va., scored a decision over Rufat Riskiyel in a brutal slugfest with both fighters punching from start to finish to the cheers of 15,000 spectators in Moscow's Palace of Sport.

"Need Basis": A Controversy

By EARLE BARROLL

The following is an excerpt from this past week's Boston Sunday Globe sports page. It is advisable to digest it carefully...very carefully, for this is going to effect the UMass athletic department to the extent of scrapping all efforts on the part of the program to achieve its goal of number one in New England:

"The Yankee Conference will have as its basic policy of financial aid to athletes on the basis of need only, with awards not to exceed individual need. Member institutions are expected to conform to this policy by the academic year 1973-1974."

What this means in a nutshell is that the well-known "full boatload" will no longer exist after this recruiting season and from there on the need basis, which has been the source of financial aid for the "regular student" will be put into effect.

This vote was taken on October 18 by the presidents of the Yankee Conference universities and according to acting athletic director, David Bischoff, "this was the initial vote and President Robert Wood as chairman of the Yankee Conference Presidents was obligated to report the vote, but it didn't come as an endorsement from him necessarily.

Head football coach Dick MacPherson has said, "I have complete confidence in President Robert Wood and I believe that he doesn't want it to happen, so therefore I don't think it will happen.

"President Wood recognizes some of the problems of recruiting on a needs basis and he also recognizes some of the inequalities on the need basis.

"Until I get further word from my Athletic Director, we're not going on a need basis."

However, in an MDC interview yesterday with the president's director of public relations, Wood was quoted as saying that the vote was unanimous, 6-0, and he gave it his full approval. There were no other comments at the time.

The big question that now comes up and that will be kicked around like a rubber ball presently is: "Where do we go from here."

Already the coaches have barnstormed the office of assistant athletic director Bob O'Connell expressing their views and from a brief chat with O'Connell a couple of days back the atmosphere that prevails is one of antagonism against this new policy.

Quotes like the following have eminated from the people who will be effected by this:

Bischoff: "I think as the largest university in New England not to aspire to be the best in everything (academics and athletics) would be inappropriate."

Jack Leaman, head basketball coach: "If our announced goal is to be number one in New England, and this comes right from the top and President Wood, these goals cannot be reached by a program funded entirely by need."

MacPherson: "I was here in '58 and '59 and there has been a tremendous growth in this great institution where we are now recognized as one of the leading universities in the country. We didn't get that way by following some of the other Yankee Conference Schools. We are the leaders and I only hope and pray that they don't hold us back in any area we commit ourselves to, in both athletics and academics."

The real crux of the matter revolves around the word "uniformity". Granted this is not a new dimension that the Yankee Conference has voted into its by-laws. The Ivy League has been on it for some time. But as Bischoff said, "If the NCAA endorsed it, I'd have few apprehensions and would applaud it."

However, the NCAA has not endorsed it. It does support the scholarship means and it is unexpected that UMass, particularly in basketball and football, will be able to compete with these schools in recruiting and in competitiveness.

Money talks, the athletes go where the green stuff is. Just for an example, and a very hypothetical one, the best football player in the country is the son of a surgeon who is good for 50,000 dollars a year. He has his choice between UMass and Boston College. UMass is on the need basis and this kid would not get an financial aid. B.C. would be able to give him a full ride. It's pretty obvious where he would go.

Another point that pops up is prestige. How can UMass build a prestigious athletic program if its hands are tied up by schools who could care less about where they're going in the world of College athletics.

And when it comes to recruiting you can bet this will hurt. Holy Cross, which joined the Conference within the last year was the victim of this "Yankee Conference unprestigious" rap in last year's recruiting season, when a 6'8 all-Pennsylvania player who had intended on going to the Cross went somewhere else when he found they had entered the conference.

Just to add to its wounds, a sophomore guard for the Cross last year left and went to Providence for the reason, "they stabbed me in the back when they joined the Yankee Conference."

Now the need basis and what does it mean. Simplistically Bischoff said, "If you want to go to UMass or Harvard, it would cost you all but."

The process begins with the Parent's Confidential Statement (PCS) which is sent to Princeton where the College Scholarship Service (CSS) computes on the basis of factors such as number of children in the family, parent's financial set-up and the like, the "Parent's contribution." This is what the parent can be expected to give the child irregardless of cost at any institution.

This is a standardized analysis, 70-80 percent of the universities in the country use this system. Now, UMass for instance will send its schooling cost to Princeton and from this the CSS will subtract the parent's contribution and come out with the "need" which is then sent back to UMass for adjustments.

This is what confronts the athletes that UMass will be going after in the future, but it can be expected with only perhaps a few exceptions (miracles) that the "big boys" who will make the program grow will find their place in a university that will toss the "full boat load" at them.

What remains now according to O'Connell is for the athletic directors in the conference to come up with recommendations as to how this need will be supplemented.

UMass A.D. Bischoff has not taken a position on this matter as of yet. "Before I would take a position," he said, "I would have to know the position of the UMass athletic council. From here, the decision then goes to me where it then goes in order from the Chancellor to the President."

Another possibility which comes up is "should we leave the conference?" How many times have you heard this? This remains a problem for the new athletic director to battle with. And just to add another important note, this decision will no doubt effect the selection of the A.D.

Digest the following...it's a pretty heavy statement of position by Jack Leaman!

"I'm very disappointed with this decision.

"Our schedule is much tougher outside the conference than inside the conference and we will not be able to play anymore against Providence, Syracuse, Fordham, Boston College and the like.

"I'm disappointed that two schools (Holy Cross and BU) who have just joined the conference have tried to dictate policy which has been in the Yankee Conference for some time.

"In the next few years we have already scheduled Niagara, Pennsyvania and West Virginia, our schedule is becoming one of the strongest in the east, but because of this new ruling we'll have to adjust the schedule.

"Any cut back now would definitely hurt the program especially in recruiting.

"This will also be a disappointment to the student body who see basketball as one opportunity to compete on the national level and be successful.

"I don't foresee any future for me or basketball at the university if we don't make revisions in the Yankee Conference or leave it completely.

"Under the need basis system Julius Erving could not have attended UMass."

Stay tuned... the war is on.

UConn On The Rocks, Tonight

By BILL BALLOU

Look! Down on the ice. Is it a polar bear? Is it a musk ox? It's.... It's.... Curly Howard? No. Larry Fine? No. Eddie Kasko? No. It's a zamboni being pulled though six foot snow drifts on the Connecticut Rink's ice surface by an eight dog team of Huskies. And on top is the Connecticut coach, Sgt. Preston of UConn.

Excepting for the fact that the UConn hockey coach's name is John Chapman, the above paragraph could come true tonight in Storrs.

You see, the rink where the University of Connecticut plays its home games is only half a building. They've got an ice surface, and they've got a roof, but they don't have any sides on their arena. Thus, it tends to get pretty cold in the wintertime.

Not only is the rink cold, but the team that plays in it hasn't been the warmest thing on ice either. The Huskies have played eight games in Division II and sport a weak 2-6 record. Overall they stand at 5-8, but these additional victories have been picked up against the poorer teams found in Division III.

On paper this game racks up as a potential UMass rout of the Norwich variety, but under conditions like the kind that might occur in Storrs, anything can happen. Last year the game was played at Orr Rink with the final result being a lopsided 11-1 decision for UMass.

The Huskies' success have been rather limited against decent competition, as evidenced by their won-lost record and the fact that while they have registered just 26 goals they have had 47 scored against them. But college hockey is impossible to predict, so the possibility of a major upset can't be ruled out. The Huskies might have been cold before, but Jack Canniff doesn't want to change the script, at least until after his Redmen leave the Arctic regions. If they've been cold up till now, let's hope they're still cold after we've gone."

The Divisional race has tightened considerably with the Vermont victory over UMass on Jan. 28. The way the Division II scene looks as of the end of January is UMass and Vermont locked in a duel for first place, separated by only one loss. However, the race for the eight play-off spots is confused by the boycott eight schools are holding in regards to the eight team play-off system. One of these teams is Bowdoin, always a threat, but the Maine school now has designs to try to come back in to the play-off picture. They will if the eight team system is cut to six teams.

So with the race as tight as it is, every game from now till the end of the season can be considered crucial. There is less than a month to go before play-off time. Even Connecticut is an important game.

One bit of advice if you're going to Storrs tonight, courtesy of Jack Canniff.

"Wear a stocking cap, a couple of jackets, about four pairs of socks and long underwear. It will be cold."

Redmen Chase The Eagle Tonight

By DAN KAMAL

Ah, there's something about a big sports rivalry that sets it apart from any "average" sports competition. The Yankees and Dodgers, the Packers and Cowboys, the Celtics and Lakers, the Bruins and Canadiens, Tuskegee and VMI (everything is relative)--all these match-ups fall under the big-rivalry category.

But none is as big (to UMass fans that is) as the UMass-Boston College pairing.

Tonight, starting at 8:15 from Boston College, another saga in the long UMass-BC will be unveiled. What will the unveiling reveal? As usual, it depends on a variety of factors.

First of all, the Eagles are a big, very physical ballclub. Up front they have Pete Schmid at 6'7 in the pivot, Dave Walker, 6'6, at one forward, and Dan Kilcullen, also 6'6, at the other forward. In the backcourt are Jim Phelan, 6'4, and Bob Smith, 6'2.

Besides having excellent size, these players complement each other well. Coach Jack Leaman noted that Schmid is a "big, strong journeyman-type ballplayer who is not spectacular, but gets the job done very well."

Leaman added that Walker is an outstanding rebounder while Kilcullen handles the bulk of the shooting from in close. Phelan is the shooter in the backcourt, which makes him a good partner for Smith who is the floor general.

The Eagles utilize their size well by playing a tough game in close. They are a good rebounding team. They also run a "disciplined offense" according to Leaman and "press a lot and play zone on defense."

The Eagles play a tough schedule. They have beaten such teams as Canisius, Fairfield, LaSalle, Rhode Island, and Holy Cross, while losing to such powerhouses as Tennessee, Harvard, Vanderbilt, South Carolina, Providence, and St. Joseph's.

Daily Collegian SPORTS

Another factor in BC's favor is its bench strength. Tom Anstet (6'7) and Mark Raterink (6'6) are the reserves Jere Nolan who is a ball-handling specialist and Dave Ulrich who is a good shooter.

Leaman feels it boils down to strength versus quickness. "We're going to need our quickness to get away from them. We'll also press a lot; our press may hurt them. Hopefully, our speed may cause them to run constantly, which is not their game. If they have a weakness, it is in ballhandling. We'll try to work on this and force a lot of turnovers."

HOOP STUFF: Leaman was bery pleased at the showing of Mike Pagliara against Syracuse. Pagliara still has his broken finger taped up, but will definitely see a lot of action against BC and may even start. If that is the case, Tom McLaughlin and Al Skinner will start at the forwards and Chris Coffin will open up at center, and John Betancourt will naturally start at the other guard position. Leaman referred to these five players as his "quick team that will press a lot." He also has plans to use Tom Austin and Charlie Peters in the pivot and to bring Rick Vogeley, "our John Havlicek, in for some quick scoring."

Roller Derby At The Cage

Many great performances have been put on in Curry Hicks Cage over the years. And this Saturday night you can chalk another one up before it even happens as the world famous International Roller Derby League will make its first appearance ever on the UMass campus.

Led by the legend himself, Charlie O'Connell (Charlie "O"), the first place New England Chiefs will be taking on the second place Jolters beginning at 7:30 on the famous banked track.

Action is non stop, the mayhem is a sight in itself. This will all come off the TV set which has been the main source of Roller Derby in New England and right into Curry Hicks Cage.

The Roller Derby has played to packed houses in Springfield and Boston on its New England tour. And there is no reason why it will not keep the streak alive at UMass.

VOLUME XCIX, ISSUE 86 UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1972

Spring Concert Gets $5,000; Index Funded

By MARY SMITH

Following lengthy debate in the course of last night's weekly meeting, the Student Senate voted to transfer $5,000 of the funds remaining in the Free University account, to the Spring Concert Committee. In other major business, the Senate voted to commend the Yankee Conference for its recent scholarship ruling and to fund Index for the fiscal year 1972-73.

The final vote on the reallocation of funds to the Concert Committee, 36-5-2, withstood a later motion to reconsider the money transfer. Opposition to the transfer of funds was chiefly based on the argument that a single, free concert, regardless of the fame and quality of the band, would have no beneficial, long range effect on the University community. It was suggested by Senate Treasurer Skip Olmstead, during reconsideration, that the University sponsor a series of smaller concerts, instead of one large one, similar to the free concert presented in the Student Union Tuesday night.

Proponents of the Concert bill argued that the presentation of a large-scale concert would give concerts evidence to the student body that the Student Activities Tax was actually doing something that all students would be able to utilize and enjoy. Led by Senators Stevens and McGrath and Vice-President Larry Ladd, those favoring the bill maintained that a concert would reach students who might normally not benefit from the tax.

In a special business motion the Senate moved to commend the Yankee Conference for its decision to base scholarship grants exclusively according to need. The bill called the decision "an important step toward equality of opportunity for all students", and the motion was passed by a voice vote.

In budgetary matters, the Senate voted against the funding of the UMass Geographical Association and in favor of funding Index, the yearbook publication.

Speaking in answer to criticism that the Geographical Association was a special interest group that should be funded by the Geography Department, Senator Gary Gomes stated that the association was like many other groups that are funded even though they are directly related to a specific department.

Citing the formation of the Association which invites all students to participate, regardless of their major field, representatives of the group argued that the association provides a viable service to the undergraduate body. But the feeling of the majority of senators went against this rationale and the motion to grant funds was defeated by a vote of 15-22-1.

The question concerning the funding of Index for the next academic year produced the most heated debate of the night. The spokesman for the Index, Jack Koch, asked the Senate to consider the yearbook, not as it has been structured in the past, but in terms of the service it supplies to the students.

Maintaining that the format of the Index will be considerably different from previous publications, Koch reminded the Senate that they were voting on the concept of a yearbook, not on the actual budgetary figure. According to Koch, the Index will not appear in the traditional hard cover version which added greatly to the expense of publication, but will probably be published in a magazine format.

Speaking in favor of the motion to fund Index was Senate Treasurer Skip Olmstead. Olmstead based his support for Index on the working of the original bill passed by the state legislature to establish the Student Activities Tax. The bill, which lists the groups that are to be covered by the establishment of the Fund, includes the specific mention of a yearbook publication.

Leading the opposition to Index, Senate President Lee Sandwen, admitted to having originally favored the idea of a yearbook, but he referred to Olmstead's reasoning as "legislative paranoia", and urged the Senate to defeat the bill. He claimed that the yearbook is unimportant to a majority of the students.

Speaking in favor of funding the yearbook were Senators Ladd and Spinn. Vice-President Ladd argued that the yearbook seems to have achieved a clearer grasp of the mood of the campus and that this year's publication will better reflect the actual campus atmosphere. Senator Spinn argued that the yearbook publication is undergoing major change that will result in a more meaningful book.

After noting that a total of 12,000 copies were distributed last semester, a fact that many senators felt indicates the favorable sentiments of the majority of the student body, the Senate passed the motion to fund Index by a vote of 32-9-2.

Two Alternate Jurors Picked In Berrigan Trial

HARRISBURG (AP) — A day-long quest for six alternate jurors yielded two prospects Wednesday at the federal conspiracy trial of the Rev. Philip Berrigan and six other antiwar activists.

One of the two was a manufacturing engineer who said of the Vietnam war: "I feel our President knows what he is doing and I'm not in a position to say whether it's right or wrong."

The other was a woman secretary at a Naval supply depot "mildly" opposed to the nation's involvement in Vietnam.

A Roman Catholic, she said she could treat the defense and the government fairly, although "I don't know if I want to sit in judgment of the defendants, these priests and nuns."

Berrigan and five of his codefendants are Roman Catholic priests, nuns or ex-priests and ex-nuns. The other is a Pakistani Moslem.

Berrigan and his codefendants are accused of plotting to kidnap presidential aide Henry A. Kissinger, to blow up heating tunnels in Washington, D.C., and to raid draft centers to call attention to their opposition to the war in Vietnam.

A jury of nine women and three men was sworn Tuesday.

U.S. District Court Judge R. Dixon Herman plans to impanel six alternates, to replace any regular jurors who might become incapacitated during the trial.

Greenblatt Fate Uncertain

BOSTON — The fate of Mental Health Commissioner Dr. Milton Greenblatt remains uncertain.

Reliable State House sources said Gov. Sargent planned to announce Greenblatt's reappointment last night at the annual legislative conference of the Massachusetts Association for Mental Health.

But those plans were made, the sources said, before the special legislative commission investigating the Belchertown State School sent a letter to the governor last Thursday urging Greenblatt's ouster.

A suit by 28 parents asking a federal court judge to order sweeping reforms at Belchertown had also not been filed.

State House sources said, "several meetings" were held yesterday discussing Greenblatt's future. The governor and Secretary of Human Services Peter C. Goldmark would not comment on the meetings.

The governor told The Union, "No decision on the department heads in Human Services had been made."

He said a decision will be announced "within the next few weeks."

The governor was asked if he would request the Legislature to remove the statutory requirement that the mental health commissioner be a medical doctor and a certified psychiatrist.

Gov. Sargent did not answer directly, but said, "Such requirements often bind the hands of the state, making it difficult for us to get the best qualified person at time."

"The best technician is not necessarily the best administrator," Sargent said.

"I'm not inferring anything in this instance," he said, referring to Greenblatt.

Goldmark refused to answer any questions dealing with whether Greenblatt, a holdover for 14 months, would be reappointed.

"It is not fair to Commissioner Greenblatt, not to (Welfare Commissioner) Steve Minter, nor anybody else who hasn't been reappointed," he said.

"When the times comes, there will be an announcement."

"Bad News"

Goldmark quipped, "I have bad news. No, it's not another special delivery letter from Sen. Quinn and Rep. Lolas."

Goldmark did say the suit by Belchertown parents brings forward "a lot of possibilities" for major institutional reform, and "may highlight" the needs of state schools.

He said a consent agreement, where the state agrees to make the requested reforms, cannot be ruled out. But Goldmark said his office has not yet been formally served with a copy of the suit.

Greenblatt favors the suit as a means of improving conditions at Belchertown.

He made a direct appeal for support from the audience of 400 legislators and mental health activists.

Minority Communities Meet; Discuss Their Future At UMass

(Editor's Note: The following is a report by the Minority Members of the Working Group on the Gage Committee in Representation of the Minority Community.)

An important meeting was called on February 2, 1972, by members of the minority communities at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst. Its purpose was to discuss the work of the Gage Committee, to analyze the reports and recommendations of the minority members on that committee, and to examine seriously the future of minorities at the University of Massachusets. The meeting was successful, not only in terms of the large attendance, but, more importantly, in terms of the seriousness with which the participants addressed historical and continuing problems which affect their lives and work in the University community. Administrators, faculty, students, staff, and community peoples from the respective minority constituencies articulated their personal experiences with traditional forms of institutional racism in the University community, their handicaps and setbacks accummulated from the University's inability to deal with the development of their creative sensibilities, the absence of a minority presence at all levels of the University life, and feigned liberalism that emerges out of a context of condescension, paternalism, and tokenism. In this sense, the participants maintained that the University has failed to service their constituent needs adequately, not withstanding the recent past. There was an expressed concern for active participation in the dynamic motion of institutional change, and more importantly, for effective participation in all aspects of the decision-making process.

The principal recommendations of the Minority Representatives on the Gage Committee to the Board of Trustees were as follows:

1. The positive elements that minority peoples have designed, administered and operated in the University community should be supported, consolidated and expanded.

2. There should be adequate financial support available to minority students, so that when they arrive on campus, they are not saddled by insecurities.

3. The University must provide adequate services and resources for the handicapped, disabled veterans returning from Vietnam and for prisoners, both male and female.

4. There should be an aggressive and well supported program for the identification and admission of capable minority students.

5. The existing institutional resources for meeting the needs of minority students must be supported and strengthened. In addition, new resources, mechanisms and agencies must be introduced in order to expand the support services qualitatively and quantitatively.

6. There must be more active, continuous and effective participation of minority peoples in program planning, implementation and evaluation in the decision-making process.

7. There must be much more direct and continuing input from minority students in the revision of academic programs.

8. There must be instituted immediately a program of affirmative action for the appointment of minority faculty and staff at all levels of the University.

9. A massive and comprehensive faculty and staff training and retraining program must be initiated promptly.

10. There must be an active participation in the process of Institutional change by foreign students from the Third World, who very often face some of the same problems as local minorities in the University community.

The meeting also charged the minority representatives that the Trustees should be informed of the mandate to expand immediately representation on the Gage Working Committee. This representation should include five (5) additional persons, one from each of the constituent groups: Chicanos, Puerto Ricans, Asians, American Indians, and a Third World foreign student. These five representatives were selected and approved by the respective minority constituencies, who actively participated in the meeting. It was felt that this would enhance the work of the Gage Committee and allow immediate access to the problems and visions of the respective constituencies as they attempt to shape and define the future.

The meeting culminated with the positive decision to form a unified working body of minority peoples that will speak precisely to the needs of their communities. A core group was assigned the responsibility of preparing the organizational format that will express the unity and purposefulness of the decisions made at the meeting. This working group was mandated to develop a viable context of operation and to provide a sense of direction for the future of minorities at the University of Massachusetts. We are now entering a new era that will be challenging to the future of the University. The participants indicated their preparedness to deal seriously with issues at hand, and their determination to shape the character of the transformation process. The sense of unity evidenced at the meeting and the seriousness and purposefulness demonstrated provided those in attendance with the confidence that they can create an arena of possibilities for a viable context of constituent responsibilities.

The present is a time for struggle; the future is ours.

15 Candidates On Mass. Primary Ballot

BOSTON (AP) — Three Republicans and 12 Democrats—including a man from Connecticut who is too young to serve in the office—will appear on Massachusetts' April 25 presidential primary ballot.

The official list was announced at a news conference by Secretary of State John F. X. Davoren Tuesday, the final day for filing nomination papers.

Republicans include President Nixon and Reps. Paul McCloskey of California and John Ashbrook of Ohio.

On the Democratic ballot will be Sens. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, George McGovern of South Dakota, Henry Jackson of Washington, Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota and Vance Hartke of Indiana.

Also, former Sen. Eugene McCarthy of Minnesota, Reps. Shirley Chisholm of New York and Wilbur Mills of Arkansas, Mayors John V. Lindsay of New York and Sam Yorty of Los Angeles, Gov. George Wallace of Alabama and Edward T. Coll of Hartford, Conn.

With the exception of Coll, Davoren said, the names to appear on the ballot were determined in accordance with the state law that requires the listing of candidates generally recognized by the national news media.

Coll, an unsuccessful candidate for Congress from Connecticut in 1970, is only 32, three years younger than the minimum age constitutionally required for a president.

Davoren said he will appear on the ballot because he filed more than the 2,500 signatures necessary to get his name listed.

Police Under Study

By JAMES E. GOLD

Members of the Law Enforcement Study Committee of the Town of Amherst, discussed ideas on the theory of local law enforcement at their second meeting at the Town Hall last night.

Major topics discussed include derivation of police power, representative police forces, community control of police, selective enforcement of laws, self-policing policies of the Amherst area colleges, and alternatives to arrests.

The committee eventually intends to put together a report on town police and recommend reorganization.

A preliminary report was released earlier by Dr. John H. Herder, a hired consultant from Civil Systems Managements. That report concluded designating two kinds of police officers in the town. One would be the traditional regular police officer, and the other an unarmed, community services officer.

As discussion opened, Herder allowed for Eric Walgren, from the Bill of Rights Committee, to state his case for joining the group. He was accepted without objection.

Other members in the committee include Rev. Arnold Kenseth, Professor of English at UMass, Leon Friedman, Economics Professor at a Springfield community college, Sue Woodfork, Jose Garcia, UMass student, Robert Patterson, Jr., Education graduate, Attorney Rosemary Sprague, Elizabeth Wheeler, Secretary at Hampshire College, Harvey Stone, Citizen Review Session, Donald Maia, Deputy Police Chief, John Tegley, Assistant Town Manager, and Police Officer Joseph Demaradski. Allen Torry, Town Manager sat in for most of the meeting, also.

Discussion also involved where the committee should go. Ms. Woodfork stated that the committee could make recommendations but should be supportive to the police who carry them out. Walgren suggested that priorities of enforcement could be redrawn, for example putting drug laws at the bottom.

Tegley, Herder, and Maia explained the present structure of the police force. A state statute allows for town selectmen to appoint a police chief, explained Maia. The state defines the possible duties of the chief, said Tegley. Herder explained that this provides for origins of police power in the community. Tegley said that it is up to the chief of police to set the rules and regulations.

Herder suggested that universities "try to take care of their own policing powers," where possible.

Walgren stated that since 90% of the police problems are concerned with hippies, it would be logical to provide for hippies on the police force.

Herder warned of the professionalization of the police. He stated that the more professional they become, the less control could be exterted on them. He cited the self-policing policies of doctors and lawyers as examples.

Herder summed up the situation by asking questions the committee can answer later. These included what are the expectations of the citizenry and what are the training needs for the Amherst police.

The next meeting will be March 1.

Panel Discusses World Trade

By ETHEL HARRIS
MDC

"Japan, the Common Market, and the U.S.: Is A Trade War Brewing?" was the topic of discussion last night in the 1972 Great Decisions series. Approximately thirty persons attended the panel discussion in Webster lounge, sponsored by the Orchard Hill Area Government and broadcast over WFCR.

Moderator of the discussion was Luther Allen of the UMass political science department. Members of the panel were Bertil Liander of the UMass School of Business Administration; Peter DiChico, president of District 2, International Union of Electrical Workers; and Solomon Barkin of the UMass Department of Economics.

Professor Liander began by stating that he did not think a trade war was imminent. After World War II, he claimed, Europe was dependent on the United States economically; however, this is not so today. Liander claimed that the U.S. has "overextended itself" in world trade because dollars and not gold were the standard of trade after the war.

After the President's announcement of August 15, the dollar was no longer exchangeable for gold; this produced a negative reaction throughout Europe. However, Liander felt that there was only a "facade of resistance", and that Europe agreed to U.S. demands because she realized the need for world interdependence in trade.

Liander concluded by stating that both Europe and Japan had more to lose than the United States from a trade war. He predicted a new round of GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) negotiations in order to break down tariff rates and barriers.

Richard DiChico advocated a protectionist view in regard to international trade. He claimed that American companies with large investments abroad have become "insensitive" to the needs of the American economy, and are more concerned with their own profit margin. As a result, DiChico claims, these comapnies are willing to close down factories in the U.S. in order to invest in foreign markets. Thus, numerous Americans are left without jobs. The labor leader did not favor "permanent barriers" but protection in certain areas.

Professor Barkin took a "middle of the road" position", advocating new rounds of tariff negotiations on one hand and U.S. business "beating competition by innovation" on the other. He claimed that a trade war probably would not take place, as the U.S. was running a trade deficit for the first time in this century and "other countries want their money back".

According to Barkin, investment by American companies in foreign countries was inevitable because of the greater profit margin. Yet he condemned business for not devoting enough money for research and development in order that the U.S. might compete successfully with foreign markets. He cited the automobile and electronics industries as examples. Also, he advocated a regional development program in New England in order to avoid mass migrations from this area due to lack of job opportunities.

In response to a question concerning the wages of U.S. workers as opposed to foreign workers, DiChico answered that the large companies with investments abroad should pay higher wages so that these workers may partake of these advantages, and not just the corporation. Liander pointed out the high costs of overhead in foreign countries, even though wages were low. Also he claimed that workers with higher educations are paid more because they are more productive. Barkin reasserted that it was understandable why these companies would invest in foreign nations, due to lower costs.

In regard to the effects of the economy upon the upcoming political campaign, all of the panelists felt that the economy would be an important issue. Barkin claimed that Nixon was aware of the problem with the business community, and realized the importance of the economic issue. Liander disagreed with the Administration's claim that the dollar devaluation would mean 500,000 more mobs, and regarded the claim as an attempt to get labor votes. DiChico likewise hoped that Nixon would recognize the economic issues, but questioned whether his policies would work.

The next panel discussion, to be held on February 16, will be "The Soviet Union and the U.S.: Toward Negotiation or Confrontation?"

Judaic Free U. Opens Monday

By PAUL QUINN

Starting next Monday, February 14, a Free University Of Judiasm will offer extra-curricular courses with the purpose of enabling people to be aware of their roots so as to establish their identities. Merkabah University is being billed as "The Free University of Electric Jewish Thought". According to its Co-ordinator, Geoffrey Levine, the courses are flexible to allow for the needs and desires of the students. The courses being offered deal with the problems and interest of today's young Jew. They range in topics from the Zionist Revolution to the practical aspects of Jewish Mysticism, From the Prophets and viewed from Atheism to seminars on Jewish identity. There are also technical courses, which emphasize practical aspects of Judaism.

Mr. Levine feels that, within the framework of a mass identity crisis, Jews have specific problems. "Until recently," he states, "most young Jews have followed areas they believe alien to Judiasm and in the process have become estranged from their roots. As a result they become lost and suffer a great deal of alienation. It is our hope that Merkabah University will show that these areas are not at all alien to our cultural heritage. Judaism is not all lox and baegels. It is not Portnoy and gold flake temples. It is not rich Bar-Mitzvah parties and mink stoles. Judaism is a heritage rich in thought and culture that is not at all incompatible with today's revolutionary world."

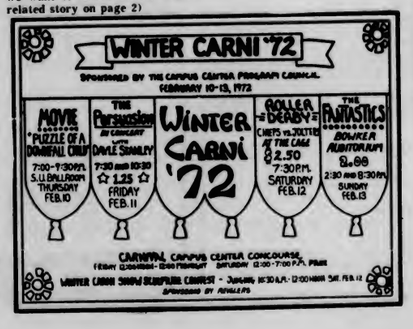
The concept of a free university will enable the participants to develop a framework for learning and discussion. Each meeting will have a volunteer facilator, who's only interest will be to help each person so that they can see a personal relevance of their Jewishness to their lives.

Though Merkabah U. is not officially connected with Hillel, it is using their facilities. Arrangements to sign up for courses are handled through the Hillel office SU 420.

Candidates Rap On Primary

By PEGGY KENNEDY

At a coffee hour in Van Meter main lounge last night, Miss Judy Gill and State Representative Edward McColgan, both delegate candidates for the Democratic convention, explained to about 20 students the difficulties involved with this year's Massachusetts primary ballot. Even people who have voted before may be confused this time, when they are faced with choosing a presidential candidate, 10 district, and 20 state delegates to the Democratic National Convention.



On the Democratic ballot, each vote will find a list of the Presidential candidates who are running, in Massachusetts. Muskie, McGovern, Lindsay, Jackson, Wallace, and Humphrey are among these.

Each of these candidates has a slate of 10 delegates from this district committed to him. A voter may choose to vote for the whole slate committed to his presidential candidate, or he may choose what Rep. McColgan called a "smorgasbord" of candidates, choosing delegates from several slates. He may vote for only 10 delegates from the district (or this part of the state).

Voters must also choose whether they will vote for one candidate's slate of delegates from the state or whether they will again split their votes among several candidates' delegates. They will be able to choose a total of 20 state delegates to the National Convention.

Rep. McColgan told students that the Democratic Party has followed the recommendations of the McGovern-Frazier commission for forming more representative delegations to its Convention. At least 40% of the delegates must be women, 1 delegate must be under 30 years old, and any district which has a minority group which is more than 10% of the constituency must have a delegate from that minority.

"It seems very early to be concerned with April and November elections," said McColgan, "but we must work now if we want to defeat Nixon." (See related story on page 2)

In The Nation And The World

Nixon Claims Peace Gains

WASHINGTON (AP)-President Nixon told the nation Wednesday he scored "breakthroughs toward peace in a changing world" by arranging his Peking and Moscow summits and by rebuilding allied alliances.

The chief executive also injected himself into the swirling debate over alternatives to his Vietnam policy by cautioning presidential candidates in a nationwide radio broadcast to avoid statements which "might give the enemy an incentive to prolong the war until after the election."

He indicated in his 94,000-word foreign-policy report to Congress that agreement with the Soviet Union is near on a pact to curb the superpower nuclear missile race.

But in the report Nixon said progress in search for "a stable structure of world peace" was tempered by several sharp disappointments-including continued Vietnam fighting, Mideast tensions and the India-Pakistan War.

He solicited election-year public support for his policies, telling his radio audience that "this breakthrough year has shown.. we can make peace a reality in the generation ahead."

The double-barreled assessment of world affairs came less than two weeks before Nixon is to arrive in China on a "journey for peace" which he said "might help avert a disastrous catastrophe later."

"We do not expect instant solutions to deep seated differences, but the visit is a beginning," he said of his Feb. 21-28 talks with Chinese leaders.

The State of the World reports came three months before his visit to Moscow. "I will go to that meeting in May," he said in the speech broadcast from his Oval Office, "with no naive illusions but with some reasonable expectations."

The Third Annual Foreign Policy Report to Congress stressed he is seeking a solution in Vietnam, but made no mention of his Vietnam critics. He did, however, confront them in his radio address.

Nixon said he was not complaining about the vigorous criticism and does not "question the patriotism or the sincerity of those who disagree with my policies to bring peace."

But he said "only the President can negotiate an end to the war." And in a statement which appeared aimed at Democratic presidential candidates Edmund S. Muskie and George McGovern. Nixon added:

"A candidate should make any criticism he believes would contribute to bringing an honorable peace. But I would hope that anyone seeking the presidency would examine his statements carefully to be sure that nothing he says might give the enemy an incentive to prolong the war until after the election."

Nixon began his radio address by citing a series of "breakthroughs toward peace" which he said resulted from his reshaped foreign policies. "These are great changes," he said. "They have brought the world closer to a stable peace. They did not happen by accident."

He made the same claim in his report to Congress, saying "We know where we are going. We are moving with history, and moving history ourselves."

Although the report was largely optimistic in tone and sprinkled with such phrases as "striking progress," "dramatic departures," and "momentous steps," it also cited "several sharp disappointments."

Chief among them was failure to negotiate a settlement of the Vietnam war. Also high on the minus list: the unsuccessful effort to prevent the India-Pakistan war, inability to score a breakthrough in the Middle East, and the expulsion of Nationalist China from the United Nations.

And the document recited an agenda of unfinished business, including broader U.S.-Soviet accommodation, a better relationship with China, and effective arms control.

Nixon gave an indication that a major break is near in curbing the arms race when, in discussing his Moscow summit, he mentioned "an accord on an initial strategic arms limitation agreement...."

The report didn't elaborate, but presidential adviser Henry A. Kissinger said a first-stage agreement-probably limiting antiballistic missiles and land-based offensive missiles-could be completed either at or before the Moscow meeting.

The 236-page document, Nixon said, was "presented with a very sober awareness of how great a task still lies before the nation."

"We are engaged in the essential job of redefining our role in the world," the President added. That new role, he said, "must be based on a solid consensus of American public understanding and support."

In the same vein, Kissinger told newsmen in a briefing he hoped the report would serve as a foundation for a "serious debate about the national purposes."

In Brief...

National Debt Raised

WASHINGTON (AP)-The House Wednesday approved a $20-billion, four-month raise in the national debt ceiling, sharply trimmed from President Nixon's request. Passage was accompanied by warnings that the administration will have trouble getting additional borrowing authority it will need in June unless Nixon proposes revenue-raising tax reforms in the meantime. The bill goes to the Senate.

U.S. Planes Fly Over Laos

(AP)-The carrier Constellation arrived in the Tonkin Gulf at dawn Thursday and its aircraft immediately began air opertions over Laos.

There also was speculation that RASC Vigilante reconnaissance jets from the Constellation were flying missions over North Vietnam.

The Constellation, with about 75 planes, cut short a port leave in Hong Kong and joined two other carriers in the Tonkin Gulf conducting air operations over Indochina. They are the Coral Sea and the Hancock.

Reports from San Diego, Calif., indicated a fourth carrier might be on the way soon.

Irving Investigated

NEW YORK (AP)-Two federal prosecutors left for Switzerland Wednesday night to talk to "a variety of people" about the complex Howard Hughes autobiography case.

The description of the visit's purpose was given by Robert G. Morvillo, chief of the U.S. attorney's criminal division, before he and Asst. U.S. Atty. John J. Tigue Jr. boarded a plane at Kennedy Airport.

Navy Builds Up In Tonkin Gulf

SAIGON (AP)-The United States beefed up its task force of aircraft carriers in the Gulf of Tonkin Wednesday for possible retaliatory strikes against North Vietnam in the event of a major enemy offensive.

Enemy attacks rose to about 50 in two days across South Vietnam, adding fuel to speculation the offensive might be near.

The carrier Constellation cut short a port leave in Hong Kong and steamed to Yankee Station off the Vietnamese coast to join the carriers Hancock and Coral Sea. Reports from San Diego, Calif., indicated a fourth carrier might be on its way soon.

The carrier Kitty Hawk cancelled all leaves Tuesday and crewmen in the Southern California port speculated they would leave for Vietnam earlier than their originally scheduled sailing date at the end of March.

The Constellation was to have remained in Hong Kong two more days, and its departure cut short a reunion that 250 wives from the United States were having with their husbands. The women had paid $600 or more each to make the trip, which the Navy called a "second honeymoon."

Only one or two carriers have been routinely stationed in the Gulf of Tonkin since the bombing halt of 1968. Informants said this new show of strength could result in another bombing campaign over North Vietnam similar to more than 1,000 strikes flown there last December.

Each carrier adds 50 attack planes to the U.S. air arsenal in Indochina. Even if they are not used over the North, they could fly in support of allied ground troops and raid the Ho Chi Minh trail in Laos.

The Navy moves coincided with stepped-up ground fighting and a widespread series of shellings in the central highlands, coastal lowlands and the northern 1st military region of South Vietnam.

Although military spokesmen hesitated to call the enemy attacks an offensive, they conceded a high point of activity was under way.

The northern port city of Da Nang was quiet following a 25-round rocket barrage early in the morning that wounded 10 Americans at the air base and killed three civilians and wounded seven Vietnamese.

Enemy gunners lobbed 14 rockets into Fire Base Linda, 12 miles southwest of Da Nang. The 140mm projectiles caused no casualties or damage, the U.S. Command said.

The allies are scheduled to begin a 24-hour cease-fire at 6 p.m. Monday to mark the Tet lunar new year holiday. The Viet Cong has announced a four-day cease-fire beginning at 1 a.m. Monday. Such truces have been largely meaningless in past years with numerous violations by both sides.

Nixon Admonishes Critical Democrats

By The Associated Press

President Nixon said Wednesday he does not question the patriotism of the Democratic presidential candidates who criticize his Vietnam policy, but he advised them not to "give the enemy an incentive to prolong the war."

In a radio broadcast outlining his State of the World message, Nixon took a public role in the dispute over the motives of the war critics for the first time since he disclosed his latest peace proposals Jan. 25.

After briefly describing what he said he has accomplished toward ending the war the President said, "I have no complaint over the fact that...I have been subjected to vigorous criticism.

"I do not question the patriotism or the sincerity of those who disagree with my policies to bring peace."

At the same time he made his apparent effort to qualify statements by other administration figures that some Democratic presidential hopefuls are playing into the hands of Hanoi, the President made this pointed statement:

"But I would hope that anyone seeking the presidency would examine his statements carefully to be sure that nothing he says might give the enemy an incentive to prolong the war until after the election."

Earlier Wednesday, presidential security adviser Henry A. Kissinger took an easier line on one of the most vocal Democratic critics, Sen. George McGovern.

"Everyone who knows Sen. McGovern," Kissinger said during a briefing on the State of the World message, "knows he's held these views consistently...with integrity and conviction and patriotism over most of his public life."

Nixon Rises Gold Rate

WASHINGTON (AP)-The Nixon administration moved through the final stages Wednesday of readying its dollar devaluation bill for Congress along with a report on key trade negotiations.

The bill seeks permission to raise the official price of gold from its present $35 an ounce to $38 an ounce, representing an 8.57 per cent devaluation against gold. Actually, the depreciation in foreign exchange markets would be 7.89 per cent.

The legislation carries out a pledge by President Nixon to seek a dollar-devaluing increase in the price of gold as part of a deal which led to the international monetary agreement reached last December at the Smithsonian Institution.

The Treasury Department held up sending the measure to Congress when it convened Jan. 18 because the administration had been unable to wrap up the trade concessions with the European Common Market, Japan and Canada.

The request to raise the price of gold has always hinged on assurances from the nation's major trading partners that some trade barriers to American exports would be lifted, Treasury officials said.

D-Day Fizzles In N. Ireland

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) — D-Day for Disruption fizzled.

The bid of Roman Catholic civil rights leaders to paralyze this bloodstained British province with 24 hours of civic chaos Wednesday collapsed in confusion and indifference.

It fed flareups of violence, but no more than usual; business affairs functioned smoothly.

Thousands of Roman Catholics ignorek appeals to demonstrate. The Catholic-based Civil Rights Association had called for massive protests against the government's policy of interning suspected terrorist gunmen without trial.

Internment, aimed at neutralizing the Irish Republican Army which is waging a guerrilla war with 15,000 British troops to unite Northern Ireland the Irish Republic, began six months ago Wednesday.

While many shops, factories and schools the association had hoped would close were open as usual, roaming bands of youths clashed with troops and police in several mainly Catholic towns.

In west Belfast, British troops returned fire at a guerrilla gunman who opened up when they were removing a street barricade, army headquarters said. The troops saw their assailant fall. Later, a 14-year-old boy was admitted to the main city hospital with bullet wounds.

Representatives of Northern Ireland's Protestant majority met in Belfast to launch their own rallies on a basis of "no surrender" to the IRA.

The Civil Rights Association intended that its D-Day would bring the province, where 240 people have died in 2-1/2 years of sectarian violence, to a near halt.

But in Belfast, there was virtually no disruption apart from the strikebound deep-sea docks. The only outward evidence of protest was a march through the city center by 500 school children chanting, "Free the internees!"

In Londonderry, where a majority of the population is Catholic, some shops and factories closed but not enough to cause disruption. A civil rights meeting in the strongly Republican Creggan Estate was canceled when no one turned up.

The focal point of Londonderry's protest was a 24-hour hunger strike by six opposition legislators of the Catholic Social Democratic party. Thousands signed an anti-internment petition.

Newry, near the North's border with the republic and scene of a huge civil rights protest march Sunday, was the main center of violence as youths played cat and mouse with security forces and flung up barricades across the main road through town.

Civil rights supporters tried to disrupt council offices across the country by telephoning to ask officials nuisance questions. But the councils said the effect was minimal.

In a development unrelated to the civil rights demonstrations, the Roman Catholic head of Northern Ireland's Community Relations Commission, Dr. Maurice Hayes, resigned.

U.S.-Soviet Arms Accord Developing

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon said Wednesday a U.S.-Soviet accord is developing on the outlines of ahistoric agreement that would curb the nuclear-arms race for the first time.

"I can report that a consensus is developing on certain essential elements which would provide a basis for further movement toward an agreement that accommodates concerns expressed by each side," Nixon said in his State of the World message.

Administration sources said they expect the first phase of such an agreement to be announced when Nixon visits Moscow in May.

Nixon indicated he wants a treaty placing firm limits on both U.S. and Soviet antimissile defense systems, and an interim agreement freezing certain offensive weapons, such as intercontinental ballistic missiles, while U.S. and Soviet diplomats negotiate further on how far an offensive curb should go.

Henry A. Kissinger, Nixon's No. 1 foreign-policy assistant, said the President's report should not be construed as abandonment of the U.S. aim to get as comprehensive an agreement as possible.

The presidential adviser gave this reply when asked whether the report indicates the first-step SALT agreement would cover only land-based missiles and ABMS with underwater missiles to be dealt with in a subsequent phase.

"Achieving initial agreeements to limit both offensive and defensive strategic programs will be a major step in constraining the strategic-arms race without compromising the security of either side," Nixon said.

"On the other hand, if negotiations are protracted while the Soviets continue offensive-missile deployment and development of new systems, the United States has no choice but to proceed with major new strategic programs."

Taking account of the overall U.S.-Soviet strategic-weapons balance, Nixon said, "There will be no disadvantage for the United States in an interim freeze of certain systems."

But the President underscored the urgency of reaching an agreement as he noted what he called "disturbing developments" in which the Russians have been racing ahead with a missile buildup during the more than two years of Strategic Arms Limitiation Talks-SALT.

"We are approaching a crucial turning point in our strategic-arms programs...," Nixon said. "Under no circumstances will I permit the further erosion of the strategic balance with the USSR."

At the end of 1971, Nixon said, the Russians had 1,520 land-based intercontinental ballistic missiles compared with this country's 1,054.

The Russians have 500 submarine-launched missiles, only 156 fewer than the United States and closing fast, he said.

State Of World Speech

"We would welcome a debate," said Kissinger.

Nixon said the third annual report was intended to give "an insight into our philosophy of foreign policy and our new approaches to peace."

Among the report's highlights:

CHINA—Of his Feb. 21-28 trip to Peking, Shanghai and Hangchow, Nixon said deep U.S.-Chinese differences will remain but it will wipe out "a sterile and barren interlude...between two great peoples" and will be a "giant step toward the creation of a stable structure of world peace."

"And," he said, "it could lead to cooperative ventures between our countries in the future." The President reiterated, however, the United States would "maintain our friendship, our diplomatic ties and our defense commitment" to Taiwan.

SOVIET UNION—His trip to Moscow in May holds the promise of ushering in "a new era of international relations... that can become one of the most significant achievements of our time."

Nixon questioned, however, the Soviet Union's moves in the Mideast and South Asia, saying they "make it unclear whether we are now witnessing...only a passing phase concerned more with tactics than with a fundamental commitment to a stable international system."

He also said the Soviets have continued a buildup of long-range missiles and airpower, adding: "These collective developments raise serious questions concerning Soviet objectives."

VIETNAM—No longer, Nixon said, does Vietnam "distract our attention from the fundamental issues of global diplimacy or divert our energy from priorities at home." But he listed as the greatest disappointment in 1971 "the failure of our intense public and private efforts to end the...war through a negotiated settlement."

He receited his newly disclosed peace initiatives and said the United States is ready to reach an agreement "whenever Hanoi distinguishes between a settlement and a surrender."

"There is only one fundamental issue left-will we collude with our enemies to overturn our friends" Will we impose a future on the Vietnamese people that the other side has been unable to gain militarily or politically?" Nixon provided his own firm answer: "This we shall never do."

SOUTH ASIA—Nixon disclosed he sent secret letters to Indian and Pakistani leaders on May 28 as part of a, unsuccessful but "determined year-long effort to prevent a war."

Defending at length his controversial policy "tilt" against India, he said his sole object was to halt bloodshed and avoid the "ominous implications for the stability of other areas..."

He acknowledged that his position strained U.S.-Indian relations but said "we are now prepared for a serious dialogue...a fruitful discussion" with India to "search out ways of transcending our recent difficulties..."

In briefing newsmen on the report, Kissinger indicated the United States was considering extending diplomatic recognition to Bangladesh-a move the White House said previously was not under active consideration.

MIDEAST—Another of 1971's disappointments, Nixon said, was inability "to make a break-through toward peace" in the Middle East. The cease-fire was maintained, he said, but no progress was made in negotiating a lasting settlement.

The Soviet Union continued to supply arms to Egypt-a development he cited in saying "the USSR's position in the Middle East reflects a mixture of Soviet interest in expansionist policies and Soviet recognition of the dangers of confrontation."

Among his accomplishments, Nixon cited "the laying of a foundation for a healthier and more sustainable relationship with our European allies and Japan" and the "creation of a new environment for the world's monetary and trade activities."

He said the December agreement on realignment of major free world currencies "put behind us the imminent danger that conflicting economic interests would lead to the unraveling of free world cohesion."

But he said the need to "finish the construction with our partners of a reformed trade and monetary system" ranks as among the major items of unfinished business.

So does the "need to deal realistically with the fact that the United Nations is facing what I can only call a crisis of confidence," he said.

He referred to the expulsion of Nationalist China as a disappointment but said "whatever its current weaknesses, the UN makes an essential contribution to the structure of world peace and thus to mankind's future."

Nixon Speech Summarized

WASHINGTON (AP) — Here, at a glance, is what President Nixon told Congress today in his third annual State of the World message:

Accomplishments

Striking progress was made in 1971 toward building "a stable structure of world peace...a more-balanced alliance with our friends-and a more-creative connection with our adversaries."

Disappointments

Chief among the "several sharp disappointments" of 1971 was the failure to negotiate a Vietnam peace. Others included the inability to prevent the Indian-Pakistani war, lack of success in finding a Mideast solution and the expulsion of Nationalist China from the United Nations.

Dangers

Continued Russian buildup of airpower and offensive missiles coupled with questionable diplomatic behavior "raise serious questions concerning Soviet objectives."

Prospects

A first-step agreement in the U.S.-Soviet strategic-arms-limitation talks might be ready for signing by the time he reaches Moscow in May.

Further, while leaving for the time being deep differences, his trip to China later this month will eliminate "a sterile and barren interlude...between two great peoples."

Six AP Reporters To China

NEW YORK (AP) — Six seasoned journalists who have traveled the world in careers with The Associated Press will be among 87 news representives accompanying President Nixon on his trip to China.

The AP contingent will be Frank Cormier, the senior news service correspondent at the White House; Pulitzer Prize winning photographer Horst Faas; peripatetic special correspondent Hugh A. Mulligan; newsphoto editor William Achatz; North Asia chief Henry Hartzenbusch and photographer Robert A. Daugherty of the AP White House staff.

Cormier, 44, joined the AP in 1951 after graduating from Northwestern University. He was transferred three years later from Chicago to Washington, where he concentrated on economic affairs.

The nation knows his voice as the one which ends White House news conferences with, "Thank you, Mr. President."

Three vehicles behind the president's car when John F. Kennedy was assassinated in Dallas in 1963, Cormier played a key role in the coverage, including the return to Washington by plane with the president's body.

38, for eight years in ... stationed in Singapore, won the Pulitzer for "daring and courageous combat photography" in 1965.

Three days earlier he received the Capa award "for superlative photography requiring exceptional courage and enterprise in Vietnam." Last Tuesday, for the second time, Faas won a George Polk Memorial Award, shared with AP photographer Michel Laurent for pictures of Bengalis torturing and killing prisoners.

Nixon To Watch Dock Strike Developments

WASHINGTON (AP) — Ignoring Democratic pleas for delay, the House passed and sent to President Nixon Wednesday night a standby bill to end the 124-day West Coast dock strike by compulsory arbitration.

The vote was 214 to 199.

The President sent word he would not sign the bill immediately. He plans to watch developments on the West Coast where longshoremen's union leaders have set a Saturday caucus to consider ratification of a tentative agreement reached in negotiations with the shippers.

House Democratic leaders protested the unusual exercise of power by the Rules Committee in bringing the bill to the House floor over objections of the Labor Committee.

Labor Committee Chairman Carl D. Perkins, D-Ky., called it a "dictatorial stand" and useless, in view of the announced voluntary settlement.

He berated House Democrats for falling into a "Republican political trap."

"All the President is going to do in a few days is call people in and say this strike has been settled and I'm not going to sign this bill," Perkins said.

Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr., D-N.J., chairman of a special labor subcommittee and sponsor of milder legislation calling for a 60day partial injunction, said: "If you jam this down their throats, and they don't settle, you just wait and see what happens 24 months from now."

The House accepted the Senate-passed bill as a substitute for a similar measure requested by President Nixon Jan. 21.

The Hourse first voted 203 to 170 for the Rules Committee resolution authorizing consideration of the legislation, then rejected on a 64-13 standing vote a substitute proposed by Rep. Spark M. Matsunaga, D-Hawaii.

The bill would order 13,000 striking dock workers back to their jobs immediately, and direct the selection of arbitrators by the parties to the dispute. The chief judge of the U.S. district court in Northern California would break any deadlock.

All issues, including those agreed to in negotiations over the past 15 months, would be decided by the arbitrators and their decision would be binding. Arbitration would be completed in 40 days, and any strike or lockout would be enjoined for 18 to 24 months.

The legislation provides for termination of any arbitration proceedings on certification by both sides to the secretary of Labor that all issues have been settled voluntarily.

A voluntary settlement, including a 32-per-cent increase in pay over 17 months already agreed to, would be subject to review by the Pay Board.

The bill would bypass the Pay Board, giving arbitrators authority to set their own guidelines under the Economic Stabilization Act.

Unborn Ruling Unchanged

BOSTON (AP) — The state Supreme Court has declined to change its ruling that ababy does not become a legal person until it is born alive.

The court ruled unanimously Tuesday in upholding the dismissal of a $1 million damage suit brought by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur C. Leccese of Wilmington against two Winchester doctors.

The parents claimed their infant girl was stillborn because of prenatal treatment by the doctors.

The high court said the requirement that a fetus be born alive "lays down a sensible and easily administered rule" under state law. It said that adhering to that law until changed by the legislature would "reduce to a minimum" fictitious claims.

Robert I. Deutsch and George R. Halsy, lawyers for the parents, agreed that the court should change its ruling because of developments in science and medicine.

Students Don't Need Life Insurance

With college costs running as high as $4000 or $5000 a year, students and their parents can do without needless expenses. And the last thing most college students need is life insurance. As we have said in "The Consumers Union Report on Life Insurance," the need for insurance arises mainly with the birth of children. The life of the father or mother, or both, may have to be insured if they are the breadwinners on whom the children will be dependent until they grow up. Unless a college student has children, as a rule he

Many insurance companies don't agree with that rule and certainly don't abide by it. The life-insurance agent has become a familiar figure on many campuses and at other learning institutions. Charles W. Alexander, an agent of Cotton States Life of Memphis, writes in the trade journal Life Insurance Selling: "The college insurance market is highly competitive. Most college students are contacted four to six times a year by insurance agents." One of CU's medical consultants, the head of a hospital training program for interns and resident physicians, has observed that his students are approached by insurance men five or six times per week. An industry survey of more than 300 life-insurance companies turned up 20 per cent with sales programs aimed at college students and young professionals who are not yet earning enough to pay the premiums.

Buy now, pay later

Insurance men approach the premium-paying problems by offering to finance the first annual premium, and frequently the second, with a loan to be paid off perhaps five years later. The interest is payable over that period at an annual percentage rate of 6 to 8 per cent or more. In many plans the policyholder pays interest on the interest, too.

The five-year promissory note with a $10,000 College Master insurance policy sold by Fidelity Union Life of Dallas in 1970 to a 21-year-old student had an annual interest rate of 8.5 per cent. The compounded finance charge on the premium loan of $151 came to $76.07. A finance company owned by Fidelity Union makes the loans and sells the notes to the First National Bank of Dallas. According to the authoritative "Best's Insurance Reports," Fidelity Union Life "has extensively developed the college senior and graduate market through its specialized college division and more than one-half of its insurance in force is in this market."

Other big sellers, such as National Life and Accident of Nashville, Jefferson Standard of North Carolina. Shenandoah Life of Virginia, American United Life of Indianapolis, Indianapolis Life, Lincoln National of Fort Wayne and State Life of Indiana (Indiana seems to be a center of the college insurance business), supply their agents with a note made out to a bank in the home-office city.

Such a note, signed by a college-student policyholder, is one of the safest loans imaginable, from the creditor's standpoint. First of all, payment is almost always guaranteed because of an arrangement called a dealer reserve. For every financed insurance policy an agent sells, a certain percentage of his sales commission is withheld by the insurance company and turned over to the bank of finance company. (The commission on the first annual premium of a life-insurance policy of the kind sold to college students is a handsome 50-to-75 per cent.) The agent eventually gets his commission money from the lender unless the student defaults on the loan. In that case, either the agent or the insurance company will sue the student.

In addition to signing a promissory note, the student policyholder must sign a policy-assignment form. If he dies, the insurance company is made the first beneficiary so that it can collect the unpaid premium and interest.

The insurance company has still another way of assuring itself repayment of that first year's premium and the compound interest on it. Built into the typical college student's policy is a separate savings account, into which deposits are paid automatically. The money comes, of course, as an add-on to the premiums paid by the student after the first year. After five years, or whatever the term of the loan, the balance in the savings account will equal the amount owed. At that juncture the insurer takes possession of the savings account. Insurance men recognize the arrangement as a miniature endowment plan with the insurer as the named beneficiary. For the student, however, it works more like an installment loan. Though the promissory note makes it appear that he is getting the full use of the borrowed money for a full five years, in reality he is repaying in installments.

Since repayment of the first year's premium depends on the student's paying future premiums, the insurance company and its lending partner take one further precaution. Their promissory note has built into it an acceleration clause, a typical feature of retail installment contracts. If the student fails to pay any premium on time, the lender can demand immediate payment of the entire loan. With the promissory note, he can also readily obtain a court judgment ordering payment.

As with most retail credit agreements, an insurance-policy financing note may be impossible to cancel. Life insurance is customarily sold for a year at a time. When a student is persuaded to buy a policy and to sign a financing agreement, he is committing himself to buy a full year's protection. A couple of insurance companies told CU they willingly canceled policies upon request and charge only the used portion of the premium, but one of those companies refused to cancel a policy bought by one CU reader. In fact, none of the policies or promissory notes that we examined had a provision for refund of premiums during the first year.

The policies CU examined tended to be relatively expensive. Typically, the student is sold some form of cash-value policy such as whole life or an even higher-priced plan, life paid-up at age 65. Few insurers offer to finance term insurance for students; that's perhaps not surprising in view of the fact that the premium for a term policy would be only one-third or one-fourth as much as for a cash-value policy. Too, student policies are usually embellished with extra-cost accidental death benefits (double or triple indemnity), a waiver of premium for disability, and an option to buy additional insurance without a medical exam. "The Consumers Union Report on Life Insurance" defines various types of policies, their optional provisions and riders, and discusses their pros and cons. A completely revised and expanded edition will be available soon.

Companies doing a big business in college policies often set up special agents in college towns. They like to recruit as salesmen popular campus figures such as fraternity leadery, recently graduated star athletes, former coaches and even faculty members and administrators. Sometimes campus figures are paid by agents for bird-dogging—lining up prospects and introducing them to the agent. In West Virginia, bird-dogging apparently became so prevalent on campuses that the state insurance department now bans it unless the bird dog is himself a licensed insurance agent.

In his article in Life Insurance Selling, Mr. Alexander of Cotton States Life took up various objections raised by student prospects and explained how he overcomes them. An objection often heard, as one might expect, is "I want to talk it over with my father." Mr. Alexander suggests the following riposte:

> Bill, probably the first thing your dad bought for you when you were a child was a piggy bank, in order to get you in the habit of saving money. All you're going to do by talking to your father is to ask him if you may start a program to make you do what he has been trying to get you to do since you were a child. That's kind of silly, isn't it?

> Bill, this program is designed for you in a way that will enable you to start it for yourself. You will be putting your money in the program, and you will cover your wife and family with it. This is why the decision should be one that you make. Don't you agree?

Mr. Alexander's technique is practiced by others, it seems. In another part of the country an irate father charged, in a letter to his son's insurer:

> My son was pressured into signing your note. When he wanted to wait to show me the policy first, your agent into high gear. He knew perfectly well that if I ever saw the policy and the note, I'd never let my son take it.

Some agents are reported to have stepped beyond the bounds of even Mr. Alexander's kind of blarney. An insurance professor at Michigan State University tells of interviewing eight students who had been sued by the same insurance company. Three or four hadn't realized they were buying insurance; they thought they were signing a medical form. Others though they were getting the first year's insurance free.

In at least one case, the student being sued was a 21-year-old who had co-signed an insurance-financing promissory note for his roommate, a minor. In Michigan, as elsewhere, a promissory note has not been binding up to now on persons under 21. Most student-insurance selling has therefore been aimed at college seniors and graduate students. But with the voting age lowered to 18, the legal age at which a signature becomes binding is also being lowered in some states. It drops to 18 in Michigan, for example, in January. Inevitably, the sales push will be felt more and more by lower-classmen.

So it's caveat emptor on campus, and another lesson in cynicism for today's youth. To quote again from that irate father's letter to his son's insurer:

> College kids these days are idealistic and distrustful of the Establishment, whatever that is. God knows, I seem to be a member of the Establishment myself. Be that as it may, you're not helping any.

Health Education

Time-Killers Needed

The in-patient staff at the Health Services needs your help. Some students have to stay at the Infirmary for long periods of time, some for several weeks. You may have some things that could relieve the boredom of these patients. Some suggested items are: a chess set, jigsaw puzzles, novels, short stories, collections of poetry, art supplies, monopoly, scrabble, or other games, knitting and crocheting supplies.

If you can spare any of the above items, they would be much appreciated by the students and the staff. Anything else you can think of will also be welcome. Take them to the Health Education Office, Room 251 at the Infirmary.

In addition, if you are interested in the new Student Volunteer Program at the Infirmary, please call Naomi Parry at 549-6789, evenings only.

Congressman Brademas To Speak On Higher Ed.

"The Federal Government and Higher Education" will be the topic of a lecture by Congressman John Brademas (D.-Ind.) at Amherst College, Monday, February 14.

Appearing under the sponsorship of the Henry Ward Beecher Lectureship, Congressman Brademas will speak at 8 p.m. in Johnson Chapel. The event is open to the public without charge.

A member of Congress since 1958, he is currently Majority Floor Whip in the House of Representatives, Chairman of the Select Education Subcommittee, and has earned a particular reputation for his leadership in education.

He has been a member for the past twelve years of the House Education and Labor Committee and has been called "Mr. Education in Congress." As sponsor or co-sponsor, he helped to write most of the major legislation concerning elementary and secondary education, higher education, vocational education, juvenile deliquency control, the Teacher Corps and teacher fellowships, Congressional student internships, the National Arts and Humanities Foundation, and the Older Americans Act.

He is author of the Environmental Education Act and the International Act, the National Center on Educational Media and Materials for the Handicapped Act, and co-sponsor of the Drug Abuse Education Act.

Observatory Open House

The public is invited to view the sky through the telescope of the Amherst College Observatory on Friday, Feb. 11.

Following a brief lecture at 7:30 p.m., observation will be from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m. In case of cloudy weather, the open house at the Observatory will be Saturday, February 12, at the same time.

The College Obsdrvatory is located in Amherst on Snell Street near the intersection with Woodside Avenue.

Play Encounter Session Today

In addition to the performances of "Bluebeard" (Feb. 10) and the American premiere of "Eunuchs of the Forbidden City" (Feb. 11-12), the Ridiculous Theatrical Company, appearing at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, will hold two informal encounter sessions during their residency.

On Thursday, February 10 at 3:30 p.m., Charles Ludlam, Director and principal actor of the Ridiculous Theatrical Company, will hold a lecture/demonstration in the Studio Theatre, South College on the UMass campus. Admission is free but seating is limited.

An open rehearsal of "Eunuchs of the Forbidden City" will be held on Friday, Feb. 11 at 2:00 p.m. in Bowker Aud., Stockbridge Hall. This session will allow students to meet the cast and to ask questions. Admission is free.

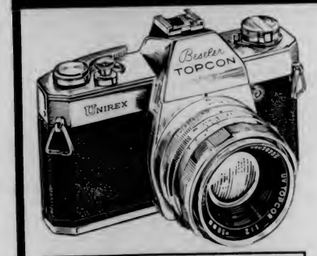
Tickets for the evening performance are still available in the Fine Arts Council Ticket Office, 125 Herter Hall, Telephone 545-0202.

Commuters Meet Today

Correction: The meeting of the Commuter Assembly is scheduled for tonight, February 10, at 5 o'clock in room 163-167 of the Campus Center rather than February 18. All UMass commuters are invited to attend to offer suggestions as to possible programs on the general direction the Commuter Assembly should take.

Nader Speech Boosts WMPIRG

In the aftermath of the Nader speech, student response to the Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group has been, according to WMPIRG, surprisingly enthusiastic. At the speech in the Field House, 800 Springfield College students signed the petition (almost half of the student body population). Here at UMass, WMPIRG received 1300 signatures at the Cage.



WMPIRG said the turnout for the subsequent petitioner's meeting Monday night in the Campus Center was impressive. About 120 people came, and all seemed enthusiastic about the petitioning drive. WMPIRG now estimates that the petitioners will gain the required percentage of student signatures within two weeks.

Representation???

This afternoon at four o'clock the Faculty Senate will for the second time vote on whether or not to change the composition of the Athletic Council to allow four students on it as voting members.

Two weeks ago the Senate voted on the same issue, but failed to reach a final decision. While the vote was in favor of admitting students, the motion did not pass because abstentions were counted as "no" votes. That move, however, has been ruled a parliamentary error, which means that the abstentions should have been counted merely as abstentions, meaning the Athletic Council motion should have passed.

That's where it stands now. Today, the presiding officer of the Faculty Senate will announce the results of the last vote as they should have been called at the meeting of two weeks ago. Namely, 28 ballots in favor, 18 against, and seven abstentions. Therefore, the motion will be formally passed.

However, there is a kicker to that.

It is very probable that the decision in favor of the Athletic Council motion will be challenged, which would require a new vote, the outcome of which would be the final Faculty Senate decision. If the Athletic Council vote is taken again, as it looks like it will be, and the seven abstentions of the last meeting vote no, the motion will be defeated and the student body will be denied representation on the Athletic Council.

We hope that does not happen. Any faculty senator who votes against the Athletic Council motion is ignoring the overwhelming sentiment of the student body. We are the people who pay $30 every year to support the Athletic Department, not the faculty. And we, the students, want representation on that Council.

Support for the motion has come from every section of the UMass student body. The Student Senate has received letters in favor of student representation on the Athletic Council from; the Commuter Assembly, Yahoo, the JOE program, CEQ, the Student Activities Office, the Northeast Community Council, the Central Area Council, and from the Stockbridge Senate, to name only a few.

Obviously, this is something students want. It is the students' money. The defeat of the motion this afternoon would be in direct contradiction of the principle of taxation with representation.

The Faculty Senate is morally obligated to pass this motion. It is the student body's right to decide how their taxes are spent.

Rhodesians Say No! No!

In January, an eighteen-member British commission arrived in Zimbabwe (Rhodesia), supposedly to test the attitude of Africans toward a November 24 agreement between British Prime Minister Edward Heath and Rhodesian ruler Ian Smith.

The agreement provides for the formal independence from Great Britain of the white ruled colony, provided the country's 5,000,000 Blacks accept the terms of the new constitution. While giving lip service to the principle of majority rule (there are only 250,000 whites in Zimbabwe), the new constitution actually allows an almost indefinite extention of the present system of white domination.

The commission contains no Africans; most of its members are British aristocrats (its chairman is a seventy-year-old judge, Lord Pearce) or govt. employees who have served in the British colonial office. Its plan was to spend a few months in Zimbabwe, interview some Black "leaders", and report that Blacks favored the agreement.

To the shock of the Smith govt., and to the British, a mass mobilization of the people of Zimbabwe has brought the work of the peace commission to a virtual halt.

On January 17, some 8,000 Blacks took to the streets of Gwelo, a city in the central part of the country, shouting "No! No!". Mobile police units assulted the demonstrators with tear gas. One demonstrator was killed; fifty-five were arrested.

Despite the police repression, the Gwelo demonstrations continued for three days, with Blacks defending themselves against the police attacks.

On January 19, the protests spread to the capital, Salisbury, where cars belonging to whites were stoned by Africans shouting "No! No!" The phrase quickly became a national slogan.

About the same time, some 200 miles south of Salisbury, in the Black suburbs of Fort Victoria, crowds of Blacks refused to listen to two representatives from the Pearce Commission. Two Africans were shot. By police.

On January 20, African opposition to the agreement spread to Umtali, about 150 miles east of Salisbury. Eight were reported killed as police fired into a demonstration. The same day it was reported that three Blacks had been killed and twenty-four wounded in the Salisbury demonstrations.

The British had previously acknowledged that Africans in the urban centers, generally opposed the agreement, although the massive demonstrations took them by surprise. But what finally put the stamp of disapproval on the agreement was the reaction of Africans in the countryside, where most Blacks live.

Chiefs in the Tribal Trust Lands are on the payroll of the Smith govt. They can be dismissed at the will of the regime.

The Commission's original plan seems to have been to send teams into the countryside, amass a series of statements of support from local chiefs, and then report that most Blacks favored the agreement. But the Commission hearings in the countryside received what the Jan. 21 New York Times called an "overwhelmingly negative response."

"As members fanned out across Rhodesia this week," wrote Charles Mohr from Salisbury, "they were repeatedly met with cries of "No! No! No!" from crowds of Blacks.

Not one commission hearing, as reported in the local white press, could be considered a 'success' from the British and Rhodesian point of view."

Smith, who seemed shaken by the fact that "his" Africans had gotten so far out of control, went on national television to proclaim that Zimbabwe Blacks are "stupid" for opposing the agreement. "What greater proof could anyone have of their lack of maturity, lack of civilization, their inability to make any constructive contribution?" asked the white leader.

Whether or not Smith and the British govt. decide to impliment the agreement, it has been completely exposed before the entire world by the wave of demonstrations. A Jan. 22 statement by the African National Council summarized the determined position of the African population of Zimbabwe:

"If our rejection of the proposals means that the 1969 Constitution will remain, then the African would rather live with an imposed oppressive position than go down in history as having accepted an oppressive constitution for himself."

Dealing With "No-Fault"

By RICHARD M. HOWLAND

On the first of January, Massachusetts became the first truly "no fault" insurance state in the nation. Judging from the number of student that have been by my office with questions, the transition has been less than easy. Rather than attempt to render the entire no fault system comprehensible at a single pen stroke (which I am not capable of doing) I would like to offer some constructive advice in coping with it.

Options: When you purchased your insurance this year you were given three options to select from. Option One is familiar as a traditional collision policy usually purchased with a deductible provision. Under this option you pay to insure your car for whatever happens to it without regard to fault. Option Two is a qualified collision policy in that you insure your car so long as you are not at fault (and with a deductible). Option Three is essentially the option of not being insured yourself. There is greater risk here now than heretofore since even if the other driver is at fault you will not collect from him or her and you are not permitted to sue. (In all cases you cannot sue even for your deductible limit.)

Rider: There is a rider to option's I and II that is being called "Option IV" but simply eliminates the deductible amount if you carry either of the senior option's and you are damaged when you are clearly not at fault at all (e.g. parked car). This is being automatically included in most option I and II policies by most companies.

Rates: As of this writing rates have either not been set or have not been published so everyone is rather on edge about paying. This should be corrected soon.

Out of State Cars and Drivers: If you are the owner or operator of a vehicle registered in a state other than Massachusetts or are licensed to drive by another state special rules apply regarding you retention of the other state's license or registration. The rules vary depending upon the state of registration or license and the facts of your presence and use of a vehicle in Massachusetts. Generally, if you earn income (usually including grants for teaching and the like) you are required to be registered and licensed by Massachusetts after thirty days in such status.

In any event if you are driving a vehicle registered in another state, Chapter 90 Section 3 requires you to carry insurance at least comparable to Massachusetts compulsory insurance minimums. This means that you may carry "Option III" type coverage for yourself-no coverage in fact, but that you must carry Property Damage and Personal Injury Coverage at Massachusetts minimums.

Property Damage: For the first time, property damage liability coverage is compulsory in Massachusetts and the minimum is $5,000.

Personal Injury: Personal injury was the first form of no fault coverage and permits a motorist no suit until actual bills exceed $2,000 or particular kinds of injury are sustained. However, owners are still required to carry minimum $5,000/$10,000 coverage as well as "Uninsured motorist" coverage.

Accidents:

Involving all No-Fault Vehicles: Each owner looks to his own insurance for coverage with the exception for personal injury in excess of $2,000. No suit may be brought otherwise.

Involving Out of State Vehicles: This situation is not really as confusing as some have made it seem. First each owner looks to his own company for coverage. As far as the Massachusetts owner is concerned if he has Option I, he is covered regardless of fault; if he has Option II, he is covered if he is not at fault; if he has Option III he is not covered anyway for his own vehicle. Then, if the Massachusetts driver was at fault, the out of state driver may recover from the Massachusetts driver on the compulsory property damge and personal injury insurance. If the Massachusetts driver is not at fault he or his insurance company (if it has paid him under Options I or II) may recover from the out of state driver who must carry the compulsory minimums anyway.

By the foregoing, I hope that some helpful information is included. It should be obvious that anyone operating a vehicle registered in another state would be well advised to verify their insurance and right to operate in Massachusetts with the Registry or with their attorney. The minimum fine for improper insurance is $100.00. It is not a situation that can be corrected retroactively ordinarily and a car thought to be uninsured by the police must be towed.

Editorial Points

Could the recent Yankee Conference ruling on "scholarships by need" lead to the end of the Yankee Conference itself? This is a possibility, as rumors are flying that some schools want to drop out of the conference because of it.

Judging by last night's concert in the Student Union, free concerts have great drawing power, but lesser known names create little or no violence?

Did you ever stop to wonder what the University might have in a file on you? to which you had no access? to which almost anyone could contribute?

Expansion of the UMass infirmary is a welcome step forward. Too bad there will be next to no parking space available during the construction period.

Letters To The Editor

Athletic Council

To the Editor:

For the past semester the Student Senate has raised the issue of greater student participation in policy decisions of the Athletic Department. Their proposal before the Faculty Senate to increase student membership on the Athletic Council is of course part of that drive. As Captain of a Varsity athletic team I would like to state publicly my support for that proposal.

Students, far more than any other group, are involved with the Athletic program. They participate in large numbers in both intermural and intercollegiate activities. They are the largest spectator group. They contribute the vast amount of operating capital thru two compulsory fees; an amount of money far larger than that contributed by either the Faculty or the Alumni. They deserve appropriate representation on the Athletic Council, which is guaranteed by the Student Senate proposal.

Most of us "students" will go on to become "alumni". If we are made to feel significant and important while at the University we will long feel a part of that community. Alumni support may be presently weak because the average student leaves the University only exploited and manipulated. How can they then respond favorably to those blantant appeals for money that follow their graduation?

In conclusion these proposed changes, I believe, will mean a better Athletic program and a more responsive Athletic Department for all groups on this campus. Only the narrow-minded would see it as damaging the Alumni-- University connection in the long run.

WMPIRG-Pro

To the Editor:

WMPIRG is asking the students of the University to tax themselves $4/year. To deny them this support is to deny ourselves a necessary avenue of defense against those forces of government and industry that threaten to corrupt the integrity of our values and the fabric of our environment. To force WMPIRG to seek contributions in some other manner will relegate them to the level of a fund raising committee--wasting valuable time and energy pleading for money. This is the chance to pay a tax for something truly worthwhile.

Swans Live

To the Editor:

Okay, so maybe I'm not writing about something of earth-shattering importance which will affect the future of the University and the entire free world, but I got rather pissed off at that caption you printed under the picture of the swan you ran on Wednesday.

Let me make one thing perfectly clear: swans are not "ITS." They are living, breathing members of the U. Mass. community. The ducks and swans in the Campus Pond mean a lot of different things to a lot of different people here on campus (as anyone who has gone to feed them late at night can tell you). Dammit, there are enough inanimate objects around U. Mass. (some of them pretending to be faculty and students). Let's not portray our friends in the Campus Pond as lifeless.

Peace,
Bill Walsh

WMPIRG-Con

To the Editor:

Before any students sign the W.M.P.I.R.G. petition sponsored by Ralph Nader they should consider what the petition entails. WMPIRG wants two dollars added to everyones student fee. If the student doesn't want to pay the two dollars he may go to some office in the school and obtain a refund.

WMPIRG will force every student on campus to pay two dollars to a political organization whether or not he wants to pay it. They justify this coercive tax on the grounds that a student can get a refund if he wants it. Such a tax is basically injust and if it isn't unconstitutional it should be. I don't see why I should be forced to pay for a political group and make an effort to get a refund. It is argued that students are forced to pay fees for the Student Union and athletic activities. I won't go into the merits of athletic fees, perhaps they are justified, perhaps they're not. But to pay for a political organization by force is totally unjustified.

WMPIRG will argue that their organization is not political. However any organization that investigates private business and seeks to lobby for legislation is a political organization in every sense of the term.

WMPIRG will also argue that they are out for the general welfare and the betterment of the society as a whole. But so is every political party. Why shouldn't the Socialists, Communists, Birchers, Republicans and everyone else have a two dollar coercive tax.

WMPIRG may also argue that if the majority of the students sign the petition the tax is justified. However in a free society it is the duty of every citizen to oppose misguided legislation, and laws infringing on freedom of action. If this unfair and dangerous tax is passed it will be the duty of every student to oppose it.

I now want to state that I favor almost everything Ralph Nader is doing for the benefit of the consumer. But I don't want to be forced to give him two bucks if I think I shouldn't. I don't want to be forced to ask for a refund. In fact I have given to Ralph Nader. But this coericive tactic by WMPIRG must be stopped.

As in previous years the MDC will continue to print letters to the editor. The only requirements are that they be typed at sixty spaces, double-spaced and absolutely no longer than two pages in length. All letters must be signed and the author's address and telephone numbers must be included. No letter will be published without this information. Also, no letters will be printed without the name of the author. Please note this change in policy.

All letters are subject to editing either for content or space according to the judgment of the editors. Also, due to space limitations, we do not guarantee that all letters will be printed.

Micro Exploitation?

To the Editor:

The profit motive keeps private investors in investing their monies in less developed countries, and so reaping the benefits that 'their' resources produce. Private foreign investors in Latin American and Southeast Asian countries are good examples of such 'anti-social' activities.

Who's to blame? What about the happenings in the Dept. of Agril. & Food Economics library which has a reserve shelf where books are kept for various courses? Students are permitted to use them and can sign them (those not on closed reserve) overnight.

Maybe rules are made to be broken. For here we have graduate students who sign them out for days and weeks on end. There are those who go one step further in taking the books without even signing for it. Even those on closed reserve disappear. Isn't their selfish-profit-motive at work, while others suffer? They don't seem to bother so long as they benefit and others pay for it.

Maybe this is true with other departments, with undergraduates as well as graduates. If this is happening on a micro level, what right have they to criticize the happenings on a macro level?

1972-1973 Budget

To the Editor:

This letter is in reply to the Collegian's editorial of February 4 which we feel contained a number of mistakes. The article concerned itself with Governor Sargent's proposed budget, which calls for a "belt-tightening" in all areas and specifically cites the possibility of a freeze on faculty positions at UMass. A few points should be clarified.

First the editorial stated that 1500 additional students would be submitted to UMass Amherst next fall. This is incorrect. While 1500 has been the average annual increase in student enrollment in the past, next fall the number will be cut to 860.

Secondly, the Governor's itemized budget will not be published until February 9 so the exact fate of the faculty freeze will not be known until this date. To write letters opposing the Governor's stand at this time would be premature.

Finally, it is the Governor's budget that is of concern here, not the State Legislature's. If, in fact the University budget is cut sharply enough to necessitate a faculty freeze, then the blame is to be laid at the feet of the Governor and not the members of the Legislature. Letters requesting a budgetary increase should be addressed to the Governor's office. The State Legislature has demonstrated its sympathy to the cause of higher education by consistently voting down tuition increases for this University.

Yan Con Shackles

To the Editor:

It is with much dismay that I react to the decision of the Yankee Conference Presidents to go further into the "small dash time" in athletics. Inter-collegiate athletics has traditionally provided great entertainment for the non-participant as well as a college education for those atheletes on scholarship grants. Undergraduates as well as Alumni have benefitted from inter-collegiate sports.

The President's decision obviously is based on a dislike for the "hired athlete" who is paid off for his labor for the University on the playing fields. Certainly this sort of illegal activity does not go on at this University: our athletic program is not a high-pressure nationally competitive recruiting program. We have a few nationally prominent teams. We do not have a big time program; a glance at our Cage and our non-existent rink show that quite clearly.

What is being overlooked in the University's decision to comply is the fact that a good program produces muchly needed revenue for the school. Someone once complained when Darrell Royal was given the rank of Professor at the University of Texas. Royal replied, "When he makes $500,000 a year for the school, I won't complain if they call him 'Coach'." Money is hard to come by, and money earned through entertainment is a good source of revenue for an impoverished University.

Bombing Policy In Southeast Asia: "Any Sign...Of Civilization In Enemy Area"

(LNS)–In the wake of massive U.S. air strikes on North Vietnam, Radio Hanoi broadcast accounts of civilian casualties in Thanh Hoa province. Nguyen Minh Hien, a school girl, said she saw U.S. planes bomb a nearby hospital; twelve-year-old Tran Thi Mai described the raid that put her in the hospital.

During the air strikes Hanoi reported a school in Dong Hoi in Quangbinh province was bombed and strafed, with high civilian casualties. In addition Hanoi said many other civilian areas were attacked by American bombers.

After the intensive bombing ended, the American command in Saigon announced that the raids were directed at military targets south of the 20th parallel. These included, the command's statement read, "surface to air missiles, anti-aircraft artillery, air defense units and petroleum, oil and lubricant buildings."

The military disclaimers have a familiar ring to them. Throughout the bombing of the North under President Johnson, the administration issued similar statements, yet the evidence of widespread destruction of civilian targets in North Vietnam is unassailable.

Last October, pilots who participated in the earlier bombing raids over North Vietnam described this apparent discrepancy from their point of view. They were panelists in a three-day symposium in Boston sponsored by the Vietnam Veterans Against the War.

Randy Floyd, a former Marine pilot, flew A-6 Intruder bombers over North Vietnam for six months. He began his testimony by reading the definition of a military target from the aerospace manual:

"A military target is any person, thing, idea, entity, or location selected for destruction, inactivation or rendering nonusable with weapons which will reduce or destroy the will or ability of the enemy to resist."

"Now clearly," he said, "that's anything in enemy territory be it a church, a hospital, homes. It could be a defense plant or some kind of power plant...Military targets are anything and everything that the enemy has, and the enemy himself...any sign, basically, of civilization in enemy area."

Later he said, "In North Vietnam and Laos and in some parts of South Vietnam, we had complete discretion. We could drop anywhere. There were no forbidden targets."

Philip Morrison, an experienced weapons controller, working from U.S. bases in Thailand during the heavy bombing of the North, confirmed Randy's testimony. He said:

"We would often check the 7th Air Force's target list and could see downtown Hanoi, downtown Haiphong. There was not a major city in North Vietnam that was exempt. And there were most of the minor cities that were included too...

"There has been great emphasis placed on how we did not bomb the downtown areas of these major metropolitan areas, but this is just not true at all." He went on to say that the justification given for these preplanned raids on the cities was that they were suspected of harboring anti-aircraft artillery, surface to air missles, and radar installations--the same justification used in the year-end raids.

"The largest city between the 17th and 18th parallel is Dong Hoi," Randy Floyd reported. "A number of pilots I've talked with dropped bombs in Dong Hoi rather than take them back, or they would drop them in cities if there was any movement in the cities, any moving target.

"There were virtually no forbidden targets in those areas. As far as North Vietnam went, I was never given instructions at all on any target that we could not bomb." In the recent attacks, Dong Hoi was bombed and a school destroyed.

The F-105, a plane that was also used in the recent massive raids has been converted from a nuclear bomber to a tactical bomber. The bombs are hung on the bomb bay doors instead of inside the plane.

This means that the pilots must release their bombs once they start their bombing run, even if they don't see their target, because the plane cannot land with the bombs still attached.

Tom Mangin, a B66 pilot, told what happens if a pilot has a hung bomb--a bomb which doesn't fall when it is supposed to. "If you get a hung bomb, you don't want to land with it because it's already armed. And so what you do is on your way home you try to get rid of it with a dump button you have on the plane and you'd usually do this over your favorite area..."

BOSTON (LNS) -- Last October the Boston chapter of the Vietnam Veterans Against the War sponsored the Winter Soldier Investigation II. For three days, expert testimony was given on the air war, the electronic battlefield, herbicides, Vietnamization, drugs, unemployment and the Veterans Administration. The experts were the pilots, navigators, intelligence personnel, infantrymen, doctors, Asian scholars, drug addicts, and jobless vets themselves.

Now a group called the Earthlight Video has compiled three and a half hours of edited video tape, which document the proceedings. They include two 60 min. tapes and three 30 min. tapes.

These tapes are available at cost on half inch video tape in the Sony AV or CV format.

Army School Foreign Military Agents

SIERRA VISTA, Ariz. (LNS) -- What do the following countries have in common–Thailand, South Vietnam, Brazil, Argentina, Indonesia, Laos, Colombia, El Salvador, Mexico, the Philippines and Paraguay?

They all have military personnel undergoing training at Ft. Huachuca (wah-CHOO-cuh) in southeastern Arizona, near the Mexican border. The training is in the form of a course in "information gathering" at the Army's Intelligence Center and School.

Presently there are 23 officers from other countries, all of whom hold the rank major or colonel. Thailand leads the field with eight students, followed by five from South Vietnam.

More than 600 officers from 50 different countries have been trained by the U.S. at the Intelligence School since 1961. The School, which used to be at Ft. Holobird, Md. was recently moved to this desolate spot when public pressure forced the government to relocate it.

Debaters Qualify For National Tournament

The UMass Debate Squad, after surviving twelve grueling rounds of debate, was defeated in the final round of the William and Mary Debating Tournament. However, they still qualified with their fine performance for a berth in the nationwide "Tournament of Champions" to be held later this year. This is the first time ever that a UMass team has qualified.

UMass was extremely well represented at the William & Mary Tournament in Virginia, attended by some 66 teams. Sophomore Terry Hofmann, of Rochester, N.Y., and junior Roger Legendre, of Leominster, worked their way through the eight preliminary rounds of debate and into the elimination rounds, making it to the finals. In the preliminaries, they scored 6-2, with losses only to Virginia and Miami, but wins over Wake Forest, two Kings' College teams, North Carolina, Clarion, and Washington & Jefferson University.

This qualified them for the octafinal round against Illinois State, which they won and then they took on Augustanna College. By again winning this debate and qualifying for the semi-final round, they also qualified for the important "Tournament of Champions", to be held later this year. This tournament involves the top 60 schools in the country and this is the first time ever, that UMass has been given such an honor.

At semi's, they met Wake Forest and were victorious over them. The final round was between UMass and Pittsburg. UMass lost this round on a very, very close 4-3 decision by the judges. After twelve long rounds of debate and tired bodies, Roger and Terry returned to UMass with a huge trophy to show for their efforts.

Also attending the William & Mary Tournament were John Day and John Hogan. Other recent tournaments were those at BU, in which Jill Peltin, Gary Jakacky, Mark Dunn, and Richard LeBlanc participated and at Bowdoin College, where Harry Feinzig and Jill Peltin were one team, while Rosemary Connors and John Hermanson made up the other.

Tokyo Quartet Coming To Bowker Auditorium

Amherst, Mass.-The Tokyo String Quartet, a prize-winning group, will perform in Bowker Auditorium at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst Wednesday, Feb. 16 at 8 p.m.

This event marks the second of five concerts in this season's Chamber Music Series sponsored by the Fine Arts Council.

There are three young men in the group: first violinist Koichiro Harada, violist Kazuhide Isomura, and cellist Sadao Harada. The second violinist is a young woman, Yoshiko Nakura.

All four are grduates of the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, Japan, where their first studies of the chamber music repertoire were with teacher and conductor Hideo Saito.

The musicians formed their ensemble in 1969 while still at home in Japan and now are on scholarship at the Juilliard School of Music.

The Quartet has entered three competitions, and emerged victorious from all. They won First Prize in the Coleman Chamber Music Competition in Los Angeles. They were selected as winners of the 1970 Young Concert Artists auditions, and were presented in their New York debut in October 1970 in the Young Concert Artists Series at Town Hall. Prior to their debut, the Quartet won the coveted First Prize of the International Music Competition in Munich.

For their University debut concert, the Tokyo String Quartet will perform Mozart's Quartet in B Flat Major, K 589; Quartet No. 2 by the contemporary Japanese composer, Akira Miyoshi, and Debussy's Quartet in G Minor.

Reserved tickets for the concert are available at the Fine Arts Council, 125 Herter Hall, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Mass. 01002. Remaining tickets will be available at Bowker Auditorium one hour before the concert.

25 Injured In Explosion

TEWKSBURY, Mass. (AP)-A liquid propane gas tank exploded Wednesday night in a heavily populated area and 20-25 persons were injured and taken to St. John's Hospital in Lowell.

Robert Pliskin, assistant administrator of the hospital, said an operations alert had been called for the hospital and all employes and staff personnel had been called back for duty.

Pliskin said seven of the injured had serious burns, seven had bone injuries and the rest were suffering from face, head and hand burns.

Pilots coming into Logan International Airport in Boston, 50 miles from the scene, said they had seen the fireball of the blast.

Fire authorities said one of several propane gas tanks in the area, owned by the Lowell Gas Co., exploded and burned out of control.

A fireman who had been at the scene said at least seven firemen had been injured. "It's all a mass of confusion here," he said.

Foreign Language Dorm Planned

By J.C.C.

Currently there is in the making, a Foreign Language Dormitory for all interested language majors and other interested students. The main purpose of this project is to help facilitate everyday use and pronounciation of a foreign language. Seminars and language courses will be offered in the dorm itself. It will also provide closer contact between language majors and their respective departments.

The specific dorm is not yet selected, as the Committee must first know how many students are interested, before it can ge set out to select a suitable dorm.

The Foreign Language Dormitory Project itself will be student run, but of course, our desires must be in accordance with those of the dormitory Head of Residence.

If enough students are seriously interested, and we prove to the language departments that it is, indeed, a good thing, perhaps all language courses (Romance, Germanic, and Slavic) could be conducted in the dorm. Perhaps the departments would even be willing to offer credit for just living there, and participating in the use of a foreign language.

With students who are all interested in language, living in the dorm, there will be an additional "common tie" (besides the fact that you all go to UMass) between students in the dorm. This would result in greater interdorm unity and also much greater unity between the various language sections of the dorm.

This being the case, much more can be done by participants in this project than is done in most dorms. Various different and appealing student activities could stem from this, such as an International Carnival, etc. The arrangement, set-up and details of discipline and activities within the dorm will be determined by the participants.

If you are interested in living in such a dorm, or if you are interested in joining the committee for its promotion, please contact:

Jim Cunningham

before Wednesday, February 16, since this is the day the Committee will meet again to decide on a suitable dorm.

Industrial Park Burns...

Smouldering ruins of an industrial park in Wakefield, after a fire Sunday. The general alarm blaze destroyed six buildings; losses were estimated at $15 million or more. The flames were fanned by 50 mile an hour winds in near zero weather. Firemen from 35 cities and towns battled the fire to bring it under control.

...250 Jobs Lost

State Employment Security Director Herman V. LaMark, standing, explains the benefits available from his office to employees of the 18 firms destroyed by the blaze. LaMark arrived the morning after the fire to conduct discussions with the employees. The Department was to move in a field office to process the claims by some 250 employees of the firms in the destroyed Robie industrial center who were left without jobs. (AP)

Scientist Denounces River Basins Plan

AMHERST (AP)-A leading scientific dissenter to the $980 million New England River Basins Commission plan for the Connecticut River said Wednesday the plan is scientifically unsound.

"I would like to see them stopped in their tracks" pending further studies, said Dr. Lincoln P. Brower, biology professor at Amherst College.

The $3.5 million, seven-year basin plan released this week has gone to the Federal Water Resources Council for funding and has been submitted to the governors and legislatures of the basin states-Massachusetts, Connecitcut, Vermont and New Hampshire.

It calls for joint federal, state, local and private implementation of flood control, reservoir, sewage treatment and other water and land management projects between now and 1980.

"The plan is a reaction to criticism rather than being really sound scientifically," said Brower. Together with four colleagues, he denounced the initial draft of the plan last year for its "complete failure to consider the vast biological, geological, and hydrological implications of the structural measures proposed."

Brower and other ecologists and concerned groups attacked the initial plan for failing to include environmental considerations and its emphasis on structural means of flood control rather than flood plain zoning.

They predicted the plan would produce erosion of streambanks, alteration of water tables, destruction of Connecticut beaches at the river mouth, adverse effects on fish and wildlife and a reduction of the river's self-cleaning ability.

Opposition to U.S. Army Corps of Engineers proposals to build some 100 major and minor dams led the commission to announce last September that it was withdrawing the bulk of the structural proposals and including them in a three-year, $700,000 environmental study.

But the budget sent to Congress by President Nixon Jan. 24 did not include the study funds requested by the Water Resources Council, leaving the commission with just $110,000 from this year's budget. The commission meets Feb. 15 and 16 to determine whether that amount should be used for ecological or flood control studies, or both.

R. Frank Gregg, commission chairman, has said the decision on the money will be largely determined by what happens to the Nixon budget cut. The governors of all four states have endorsed the $700,000 study and congressmen have been asked to tack on the needed funds.

Bernard B. Berger, director of the Water Resources Research Center at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst and moderator of the Citizens Review Committee formed to evaluate the original basin plan, said Wednesday the supplemental study is essential. "If there's no continuity, you might just as well forget about it. It's foolhardy to go ahead and make decisions without the basic information the studies would provide," he said.

Brower and some other ecologists feel the $700,000 study itself is not enough. He has proposed a five-year study, using computers, that could cost as much as $10 million.

In the meantime, he suggests the government spend its money on pollution abatement. "The problem of pollution is one that can be coped with. It doesn't bother me half as much as the structural changes and river diversion. These are unalterable changes. Cleaning up pollution is simply a matter of money," he said.

The 1980 plan recommends diversion of the river into Quabbin Reservoir in Central Massachusetts, which provides drinking water to greater Boston.

However, the plan recommends that downstream states have a voice in water allocation, a condition that could have profound effects on Connecticut.

Brower said the diversion violates the Connecticut River eco-system and is being done in mindless fashion. They shouldn't take a drop out of the river until the whole thing is studied in detail."

The theory behind the diversion is that spring flood waters, so-called "waste water," are a potential flood threat and would not be missed downstream.

"Flood waters are not waste waters," countered Brower. "In fact, they are vital to the survival of the river. To consider them waste waters, as the plan does, is a measure of the ignorance of the people who are determining the future of the river," he said.

Pay Board Wants Clearance On All Raises

WASHINGTON (AP)-The Pay Board said Wednesday it will require advance clearance of all presently scheduled future pay raises that exceed 7 per cent a year for units of more than 1,000 employes.

However, the board stopped short of trimming back automatically all deferred raises over 7 per cent, as had been urged publicly by some business members of the board.

Once fully effective, the new regulation will require that all pay raises of over 7 per cent a year for units of more than 1,000 employes be reported to the board 60 days in advance, along with reasons why they should not be trimmed back.

Future deferred raises in contracts effective before last Nov. 14 still will be paid unless specifically rejected by the board as "unreasonably inconsistent" with the general 5.5 per cent ceiling that applies to contracts reached since then.

The new ruling may increase the likelihood that some or most of those deferred raises will be trimmed back. The five business members of the board already have announced their desire to challenge deferred raises exceeding 7 per cent a year.

The board adopted the new requirement 9 to 5 over the objection of labor members. Chairman George H. Boldt abstained.

The ruling doesn't affect Category III wage units, which are those with fewer than 1,000 employes. In those units, deferred raises of more than 7 per cent generally may continue to be paid without advance approval.

Also unafected are union construction contracts, which still need advance clearance by the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee no matter how small the unit or the pay raise involved.

The board announcement came a few hours after it had disclosed that it is inviting public comment on its new merit-pay guidelines-the first time it has sought such a citizens' assessment before putting in a binding rule.

The board issued an official announcement of the proposal Wednesday after approving it 11 to 1, with three abstentions, late Tuesday.

It would scrap present merit-pay rules, which grant an exception to general wage standards generally on for those merit raises paid in accordance with a union contract.

Instead, it would allow an exception for both union and non-union merit raises, provided they are paid in accordance with an established plan that meets certain specific standards.

After a time, the proposal would prohibit such merit raises from raising the average of all of a firm's pay increases to more than 7 per cent.

DEFEND THE BUDGET--Director George P. Schultz of the Office of Management and Budget and his deputy, Caspar Weinberger, background, appear before the House Appropriations Committee for hearings into the administration's federal budget for fiscal 1973. (AP)

Here, in a question-and-answer format prepared by The Associated Press, are highlights of the board's proposal, which may be revised somewhat before it takes effect:

Q. Will merit raises be counted when figuring whether a particular firm's pay increases fall within the general limit of 5.5 per cent a year?

A. Yes, unless the raises are paid in accordance with a plan that meets Pay Board specifications, and which was in effect before last Nov. 14. Even then firms won't be able to pay more than 7 per cent in total merit and nonmerit raises after persent plans expire and are renewed, or in any case after next Nov. 13. Until they are renewed, present merit-pay practices that meet standards may continue to function without regard to the 7 per cent ceiling, subject to possible specific challenge by the Pay Board or an interested party.

Q. Must the plan be in writing?

A. No. Unwritten plans may qualify, although it is expected most won't meet the Pay Board's strict criteria.

Q. Can a firm with no acceptable merit plan still reward individual employes for their performance?

A. Firms with no acceptable merit plans may still give merit raises, as long as the total of all their merit and nonmerit raises doesn't exceed 5.5 per cent a year if the firms win an exception on other grounds.

The Pay Board already has said it will grant certain exceptions of up to 7 per cent a year for firms that need to attract or hold new employes, that have historically pegged their pay to someone else's in a tandem relationship, or that have paid less than 7 per cent a year in raises in recent years.

Q. Do these 5.5 and 7 per cent figures mean that individual raises can't exceed those amounts?

A. They don't limit individual raises, but apply instead to the aggregate average of all of a firm's raises. In other words, a firm under the general 5.5 per cent standard might legally grant raises of 11 per cent to half its employes and no raises at all to the other half.

A firm qualified to go up to 7 per cent under one exception or another might legally give a 4 per cent raise to all its employes and grant additional 6 per cent merit-raises to half its employes. In both cases the average of all raises given in that year would fall within appropriate guidelines.

Q. How formal does a merit plan have to be to keep merit raises from counting against the 5.5 per cent standard?

A. The plan must have been in existence last Nov. 13, must spell out specific jobs, must have clear standards for determining who gets raises within those ranges and how large the raises will be, and must have an administrative plan.

Q. Does it have to be in a union contract, or can it be a plan made up by management alone?

A. Either way is all right.

A. If a firm didn't have a formal merit plan in effect last Nov. 13, can it draw up a new one that will allow it to pay merit raises outside the 5.5 per cent guidelines?

A. No. New merit plans will not exempt a firm from the 5.5 guideline, even if they meet all the other criteria. Old plans that are renewed-"successor plans," the board calls them-become subject to a 7 per cent lid on total merit and nonmerit raises.

Q. When a plan is renewed, what is to keep a firm from widening the pay ranges for specific jobs in an attempt to get around the 5.5 per cent guideline?

A. The Pay Board's proposal would prohibit this. It says the ratio of the maximum to the minimum pay in each range may not be increased.

Q. Must firms get advance approval to resume paying merit raises under acceptable plans?

A. Yes, if the wage unit has 5,000 or more persons in it. For smaller units only a report to the government is required.

Q. If a firm didn't have a formal merit plan in effect last Nov. 13, can it draw up a new one that will allow it to pay merit raises outside the 5.5 per cent guideline?

FREEWAY DRAMA–After rescuing Mrs. Pearl Eidem from her flaming car on a Los Angeles freeway, passers-by attempt to quench flames in car, fearful that a second person was inside. It turned out Mrs. Eidem had been alone. At right she is given first aid as her car burns in background. Mrs. Eidem's car caught fire after it hit another car which had slowed up because of steering problems. She was reported in serious condition later. (AP)

Police Look Out For Long Hair

BOSTON (AP)-The mod look in hair styles has drawn the attention of police who register pistol permits.

"What we're requesting police departments to do," says State Police Cpl. Robert Coveney, "is when they issue a license, to put on a new picture.

"With these changes we see-long hair, sideburns and others-a man's appearance can be changed greatly."

Coveney said most police departments in the Bay State's larger communities require new photographs when pistol permits are renewed every two years, but some departments have used old photos.

"What we're aiming for is to bring the picutres up to date," he said, "especially on the hair styles."

Pistol permits in Massachusetts are issued through the community police station. A private citizen must renew his permit every two years.

The pistol permit is separate from the Massachusetts firearms identification card which must be obtained by all persons who have any kind of firearms in their possession, and is good for five years. It does not require a picture.

The pistol permit requirement, which is registered with state police, has been in effect for years. The firearms ID card was part of the model gun control law passed by the legislature in 1968.

SPRINGFIELD, (AP)-Wenesday was perhaps the brightest day of 1972 for WGBY, Channel 57, public television for western Massachusetts.

On the air since last Sept. 26, the fledgling station had just mailed out 156,000 fund-raising letters Jan. 6, when an antenna failure atop Mount Tom, Holyoke, knocked it off the air for three days and subsequently forced it to broadcast at half-power with temporary antenna facilities until Wednesday.

In addition to completion of the rebuilt antenna, the station learned it was granted a $75,000 charitable grant from a Valley Bank & Trust Co. trust fund. The grant from the Nan and Matilda Heydt Fund will be used for developing local programming, now restricted to limited, black and white broadcasts.

Russell F. Carpenter, station development director, said WGBY hoped to raise $15,000 with the mail campaign, but only half of that has come in, which he attributes to the poor reception across western Massachusetts since the antenna failure.

But he annnounced the start of a capital campaign this week, in which local committees will send personalized letters and make personal contacts seeking large gifts.

"Our original goal for this year was $1 million so we could have full color local origination by next September," said Carpenter.

WGBY studios are located in the main arsenal building of the old Springfield Armory. The noncommercial station is inter-connected via microwave with WGBH-TV, Boston, and carries programs of the Public Broadcasting Service PBS, including Sesame Street, the Electric Company, Zoom, and Masterpiece Theatre.

Stefani Indicted In Murder

NEW YORK (AP)-Manhattan grand jury Wednesday returned a murder indictment against Walter Stefani, 48, of Springfield, Mass., in the shooting death last month of Nathan L. Levine, 61, a lawyer and nephew of the late Whittaker Chambers.

Stefani, who also gave police a Manhattan address, has been held without bail since Levine's death.

Police said Levine was shot once in the back of the head when Stefani, identified as former client, invaded the lawyer's office on Fifth Avenue to demand payment of a debt.

Stefani was to be arraigned on the indictment in State Supreme Court here next Monday.

He gave his Springfield address as 33 Salem St.

Earn Credits, See Greece

The International Olympic Academy of Athens, Greece, will hold its eleventh session at Olympia, Greece from July 12-30, 1972. College students, physical education faculty, coaches, and athletes throughout the world are invited to participate in these annual sessions. Six credits will be given to undergraduates majoring in physical education who participate in the program. Undergraduates in other fields could get credit subject to approval of their advisors and deans.

The Academy will have world renowned experts to lecture on special subjects pertaining to the philosophy and ideology of the Olyinpic Movement. The official languages are English and French. Seminars, study interest groups, athletic events, recreation periods and social evening programs are also on the agenda. The program will be interspersed with archaeological visits to digs, trips to beaches and other fascinating places of interest, including an all-day trip to Delphia.

Murder Threat A Fake

BOSTON (AP)-British Consul General Alastair Maitland was escorted to his office here Wednesday without incident as an assassination threat failed to materialize.

Police guarded the offices and street level lobby of the Prudential building Tuesday night and Wednesday after a newspaper said it received a call from an unidentified male Tuesday night saying Maitland would be assassinated as he approached his office in the building.

The Record American said the caller told them that a dozen men he described as "psychopaths" planned to gun Maitland down because they were enraged over events in Northern Ireland.

The caller said he was in on the alleged plot but had a change of heart, the Record American reported.

Maitland has been under police guard for some time because of previous threats and several anti-British demonstrations at his offices.

Police sent a car with several officers to bring Maitland from his home to his office Tuesday morning.

Scriptwriter Testifies That TV Programs Are Unrealistic

WASHINGTON (AP)-Nightly, 75 million Americans are fed network-censored television programs that are bland, unrealistic and designed only to sell laxatives and deodorants, a man who writes TV scripts said Tuesday.

Eighty-one per cent of the nation's 3,000 writers of network comedy, drama and variety programs believe television presents a distorted picture of U.S. politics, economy and racial situation, David Rintels of the Writers Guild of America told the Senate subcommittee on constitutional rights.

Rintels said network chiefs wrongly believe 60 per cent to 70 per cent "of the American people are willing to settle for nonstop, lowest-common-denominator programming."

"We are horrified because we know" American viewers are seeing nothing but programs deliberately designed to have no resemblance at all to reality, nonsense whose only purpose is to sell snake oil and laxatives and underarm deodorants" said Rintels, chairman of the guild's censorship committee.

Rintels said the writers agree with industry spokesmen who defend situation comedies, Westerns and noncontroversial dramas as entertaining.

"But we also believe that television has a responsibility not to deceive," he said.

Rintels said, for example, that in the various programs based on doctors and hospitals, patients are never denied beds nor required to wait for one, doctors never charge for their services and "almost every doctor cures almost every patient-if only the patient lets him."

Rintels said he wrote a script for "The FBI" television series about a Brimingham, Ala., bombing of a church in which four black girls were killed.

By the time the proposed script came back from the network, the sponsor, the FBI itself and the producing company, he said, the church was moved to the North, no Negroes were involved and the bombing had nothing to do with civil rights. Rintels said he withdrew from that program.

N.H. Critical To McGovern

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Sen. George McGovern, D-S.D., said Wednesday a crushing defeat in the New Hampshire presidential primary-a possibility foreseen by at least one pollster-would likely end his presidential ambitions for 1972.

"It would be difficult to continue this campaign under those cirucumstances," he said in Boston in answer to a newsman's question about what he might do it "thoroughly crushed" in New Hampshire.

One recent poll shoed McGovern getting 18 per cent of the Democratic vote in New Hampshire to 65 per cent for Sen. Edmund Muskie, D-Maine.

McGovern would not say what percentage of the vote might constitute a "crushing" defeat, but he said, "We're going to do very well in New Hampshire and I say there will be a lot of embarrassed pollsters after March 7," the state's primary date.

Meanwhile, Muskie was in Claremont, N.H., to pursue his presidential bid.

Answer to Yesterday's Puzzle

Distr. by United Feature Syndicate, Inc. 10

In yesterday's story on the Infirmary the Collegian reported that the new South Entrance would be used beginning this month. It will not be used, however, until sometime in June. During early construction a ramp will be placed over the construction site to enable students to continue using the main front entrance.

Indians Burnt At Stake

By JOHN BOCK

It isn't well-known how communication channels run in the Ivy League but if someone would like to test this statement then an appearance at the Tuesday night wrestling match between UMass and Dartmouth would have sufficed to provide a reasonable conclusion.

Harvard, Yale, and Columbia must have had a bad connection when they tired to tell the Indians the weaknesses in the Redmen lineup. On the other hand there weren't any if a 34-7 victory means anything.

The stellar performance by the squad might have been due to the fact that it was the last time Seniors Godowsky, Goldberg, Jester, and Buckbee would wrestle before a home crowd and they wanted to give the fans something to remember them by.

It wasn't hard. After Dave Amato's pin against Dartmouth's 118 pounder, senior Barry Godowsky, "Master of the High Crotch" brought home the bacon in the form of a 3-2 decision over Branch. The score would have been higher if the Dartmouth man had not started something that would catch on with his teammates-stalling his tights off. After Barry took him down Branch made up for lack of experience at wrestling by showing his proficiency at dancing away the clock and coming back slowly to the center of the mat.

Then Clay "Easy Rider" Jester continued the display of senior power with an 8-3 win over Morelli at 142 lbs. The Dartmouth man couldn't do anything against Clay's tough tight waist ride. It was a great effort to hold Clay down for the thirty seconds that he did. Clay is a good defensive wrestler on his feet and he left the fans with that impression as he caught his man in a lateral drop attempt and put him flat on his back only to have the referee to stop the match for an injury.

Shelley Goldberg in his own words said, "I've never lost a home match in my life and I wasn't about to start." So "Silver Dollar" Goldberg did something almost as rare for his last home match–He pinned his man. The Dartmouth man was out on the mat just long enough to find out why Shelley will be going for his third New England title and why it is useless to defend your legs against the inevitable "Shelley single leg".

Of course, it wasn't only seniors that knocked the teepee down on Dartmouth. At 158 Chris Cadwallader, freshman from Pennsylvania, pulled some tricks out of his bag and ended up 8-3 over Sweet of Dartmouth. Mike Duffy was about as tough as one could get when he threw a split scissors (as the name implies it involves taking the man and splitting his legs as far apart as an open pair of scissors) on his opponent at 167. Mike came out on top 10-7.

Bruce Buckbee found that one can only push some people so far and then they start pulling. It is hard to believe that a sophomore could learn to handle a senior so well, but wrestling with the New England Champ (Thompson of Dartmouth) can do wonders.

The biggest comeback performance of the evening was wrestled at 190 pounds by John Connolly. It was doubtful if he would even make the first period of the match as his Dartmouth opponent took him down on the first move and almost turned him over. For the remainder of the first and for the entire second period Connolly was helpless on the bottom. In the third period it was his turn and with the skill of the State Champ that he is, John drove his opponent to the point that he crawled off the mat three times before he finally couldn't keep Mauler Connolly from sticking him in the last sixty-five seconds of the match.

Carl Dambman was overheard talking with a spectator who said he had to leave, but was sure that Carl would win anyhow. The mustached German heavyweight applied the right combination early in the second period to score his seventh pin of the season and maintain the faith that his fans have in him (not to mention the rest of the team and Coach Barr).

"Wrestling a tough schedule put us ahead of Dartmouth in a lot of ways," emphasized Coach Barr "and I think it will continue to show its benefits as we head for the New Englands."

Dartmouth couldn't agree more.

"I'VE BEEN HE.E so long I think I'll take a nap", says Shelley Goldberg.

Frosh Squeak By

The UMass freshman basketball team won a squeaker by the score of 77-72. For the first time this year the frosh went into the final minutes with the winner still in doubt.

With just 1:43 to go the B.C. Frosh led 72-71 and the Eagles had the ball. Coach Fan Gaudette called a time out saying to his players "relax". From that point on it was all UMass as an Eagle was called for walking trying to cope with the man to man defense.

John Murphy took a shot from fifteen feet out to score the go ahead bucket. For the first time this year B.C. was forced to play "the game" UMass style. The tight defense did not allow the Eagles to penetrate at all.

Tom Gillams rebounded the first shot and the frosh went into a stall. Jim Burke was fouled and hit both free throws. The Redman defense once again made the Eagles throw up a desperation shot–they missed. Mike Flanagan hit two moresfree throws as Coach Gaudette's cagers relaxed to win their tenth straight.

A surprising end to a game which the frosh had led at half time by 35-26. The B.C. Frosh were by far the toughest challenge for the UMass yearlings.

Bill Endicott was the big gun once again as he shot from underneath, the corners, and the top of the key. Gillams and Murphy controlled the boards by blocking out the opposition. Rick Boron played a strong game coming off the bench in the second half by getting a quick rebound and bucket and resting starter Mike Flanagan.

UMASS DRIBBLINGS: Murphy led another balanced scoring attack with twenty-five points followed by Endicott, 17 Gillams, 14, and Burke, 11. The high for B.C. was Ivo Holland with 21 points.

The next game is Saturday with UConn and super frosh Earl Wilson, Jr.

Russia Trounces U.S.

SAPPORO, Japan (AP) — "They brutalize you physically and they intimidate you mentally," an American pro scout said Wednesday of the Soviet ice hockey team after watching the Big Red line crush the United States 7-2.

"They're tough. I know of only one team in the National Hockey League that could out-muscle them-the Boston Bruins. I think the Russians could hold their own with any other team."

Jack Paterson, director of scouting in the United States for the Detroit Red Wings, watched the Russians take apart a young, aggressive, but inexperienced American team in Group A play in the Winter Olympic Games.

It wasn't his first look at the Soviet team. He's been watching them for years and drooling.

There are at least four men on the team, he insists, who could step into any NHL lineup right now. However, as property of the state, they are untouchable.

"They play more like the Montreal Canadiens than any other team in the league," Paterson said, "but they have qualities of some of the other good teams.

"The Canadiens concentrate on good skating. So do the Russians. But the Russians also like body contact. They hit hard. In that respect, they're like the New York Rangers. It's hit, hit, hit.

"The Bruins go for size. That's where they would have an edge over the Russians.

"But don't underestimate the physical strength of this team. If a player is 5 feet 8, you can bet he's the toughest 5-foot-8 man in all hockey. If he's 5-9, he's that much bigger and stronger."

The Detroit talent executive said the rason the Swedes played the Russians to a 3-3 tie in an early game was that the Swedes refused to be intimidated. When the Russians hit, the Swedes hit back.

"This was one of the most brutal, savage games I have ever seen," he added. "There were five or six outright spearings. Elbows were flying. One guy had nine stitches taken in his face.

"The Russians have what the football people look for-they accelerate. They're quick as cats."

Buffalo Stadium

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP) — The Kenford Co., reviving plans for a domed Buffalo sports stadium Wednesday, said it hoped to get a big league baseball team to play in the arena.

President Edward H. Cottrell said the $55-million dome would be part of a 1,000-acre multi-million-dollar residential and business development suburban Lancaster.

He said it would be built with private funds rather than public money.

Erie County had proposed over four yeaers ago building a dome stadium in Lancaster. But the County legislature later ditched the plan and now is going ahead with a proposed $23.5-billion football-only stadium in nearby Orchard Park.

The Buffalo Bills of the National Football League have signed a long-term lease to play in the Orchard Park Stadium.

Olympic Briefs

Miss Henning set an Olympic record of 43.33 seconds in winning the event.

She set her record on her second try, after it was ruled she was fouled during her first run. Her time for the first try was 43.75, also a record.

With a sensational finish and excellent timing of his race, 30-year-old Norwegian farmer Paal Tyldum won the gold medal in the 50-kilometers cross-country skiing race in 2 hours, 43 minutes and 14.75 seconds Thursday at the 11th Winter Olympic Games.

Magne Myrmo, a 28-year-old shop assistant, also came from behind to give Norway the silver medal in 2:43.29.45 for the 31 miles. The Russian favorite, Vyacheslav Vedenin, who won the opening 30 kilometers race last week, grabbed the bronze medal in 2:44.00.19 to prevent a clean sweep for Norway.

Two Tie For Lead

PALM SPRINGS, Calif. (AP) — Veteran Bob Rosburge, who has not won in more than a decade, and young Jerry Heard matched six-under-par 66s Wednesday to tie for the first-round lead in the $145,000 Bob Hope Desert Golf Classic.

Rosburg and the 24-year-ld Heard held a one-stroke lead over Chuck Courtney and Jimmy Powell, a club pro from Yorba Linda, Calif., tied at 67 with 72 holes to go in this unique event.

Jack Nicklaus headed a guartet at 68-just two strokes off the pace-and defending champion Arnold Palmer was another stroke back at 69.

Lee Trevine all but shot himself out of it with a fat 76.

Skaters Win; Hoopsters Bow

By BILL BALLOU

The script was as predicted, but the heroes were different.

A crowd of about three hundred frigid fans and one lethargic pigeon watched the UMass hockey team totally annihilate the UConn Huskies 11-2 at Storrs. The high scoring line of Pat Keenan, Dan Reidy, and Jack Edwards came through as usual, but the big guns for the Redmen were the newly assembled linemates of Dennis Grabowski, Lonnie Avery, and Jim Lynch.

This line accounted for nine scoring points and three goals. The line was put together by Coach Jack Canniff for the Merrimack game, and its play last night pleased the UMass coach. But he cautioned, "You've got to take into account the competition" and warned that Northeastern is coming up on Saturday.

Redmen did not help themselves very much by firing sixteen shots wide of the net.

Goals in that first period came off the sticks of Keenan and Reidy, but Hinman was able to effectively blunt that high scoring line's power for the rest of the game, allowing just one long slapshot goal by Keenan over the final two periods. However brilliant he was, Hinman had his problems in the second period, allowing six UMass goals that broke the game wide open and assured the Redman victory.

Dapper goalie P.J. Flaherty, resplendent in his red stocking cap, had a vacation in the Redman net for those two periods, facing just thirteen Huskies' shots, and stopping them all.

With the issue already decided after two stanzas, the Huskies managed to come back in the final period, with two goals against new goaltender Chick Rhealt. UConn scorers were wingers Paul Bastarache and Bob Monroe, the latter's goal coming on a power play with only twenty five seconds left in the game.

UMass scorers in this one were for the most part people who had not contributed that many goals thus far this season. Grabowski, Mike Waldron, and Pat Keenan had two each, with Keenan upping his total to 26 for the season. Other scorers were: defensemen Bob Shilalie and Bob Bartholemew, and wingers Jim Lynch, Chico Shea, and Dan Reidy.

Looking forward to Saturday's game against Northeastern, Coach Jack Canniff figured that "We're always glad to get a win, and any time on any night you can suddenly go flat, fall on your face and lose. We'll take this one, and point for Northeastern."

That game against N.U. is listed on the schedule as starting at two P.M., but has been moved up to an eight P.M. starting time.

Grabowski, a happy man, had his biggest night of the season with two goals and two assists but gave much of the credit to his linemates Avery and Lynch. "They did all the work, doing the digging in the corners and setting me up." He added, "I was unhappy to be taken off the third line because it means I'll play less, but these guys are alright."

Another milestone for the Redman attack was the sudden emergence of their powerplay as a potent unit. Up until this game, the Redmen had scored just ten goals with the man advantage. But against UConn. they were able to fire home four on the powerplay. But, this figure is still at least ten goals behind last year's pace.

While the Redmen were able to rack up eleven goals, after the first period it appeared that they might be in for a long night. Goaltender Rich Hinman was spectacular in the UConn nets throughout the first stanza, blocking off fifteen of seventeen shots fired at him. The

All season long goalie P.J. Flaherty has been steady in the UMass net. Here he is shown making one of his many fine saves.

By EARLE BARROLL

NEWTON-There was one heck of a collegiate basketball game. Boston College held off UMass in the last seven seconds and preserved a 75-74 victory over the Redmen at Roberts Center here last night.

Both teams had chances to win the ballgame in the last forty seconds of play. Prior to this Mike Pagliara had hit a jump shot to make it 75-74 BC. UMass was forced to play tight defense and if need be the case foul. The latter took effect, but Jim Thalav missed a one and one free throw and on the ensuing scramble BC got the ball.

Once again UMass fouled and Mark Raterink went to the line and missed also, and this time UMass got the ball with seven seconds to play. Time was called, Leaman made some substitutions, and UMass had the ball some seventy feet from the hoop.

John Betancourt hit Al Skinner with a pass on the inbounds play, and Skinner dribbled up court. He was pressured to pass, and a BC player intercepted and that was it.

The final is an indication of the tightness of the game. No team was able to gain control at all during the game, a game that was very physical and very fast. UMass led at the half by a score of 42-39, but as has happened many times in the past, the Eagles pulled it out. This was also a game of many fine efforts:

---Tom McLaughlin who had 27 points on nine of twelve from the field and pulled in six rebounds as the BC physical game played into his type game of muscle vs. muscle.

---Mike Pagliara, scored seven points and whose return to the lineup added a long missed stabilizing force to the Redman attack.

---Mark Raterink and Tom Anstett of BC...sound like a couple of lawyers, the names have not been seen in the BC lineup often, but between them they kept BC in the game during the second half before the last second heroics.

The Redmen now stand 11-7; BC 7-10.

Word From Olympics

SAPPORO, Japan (AP)-That old Maurice Chevalier favorite, "Thank Heavens For Little Girls," has been adopted as the theme song of officials at the U.S. Olympic delegation.

The 90 men on the American team haven't collected a single medal to take home from Sapporo so far-and they may not get any.

The women' teams have 27 members and already they have one gold and two bronze medals, with more in prospect. Dianne Holum, 20, of Northbrook, Ill., won the women's 1,500 meter speed skating, and will be trying for more medals in the 1,000 meter Friday and 3,000 meter Saturday.

Janet Lynn, 18, of Rockford, Ill, won her bronze medal in the women's figure skating. Susan Corrock, 20, of Keetchum, Ida., took third place in women's downhill.

Anne Henning, 16, of Northbrook, Ill., is a favorite in the women's 500 meter speed skating Thursday.

Dianne Holum, winner of the Olympic 1,500 meter speed skating gold medal, has announced that she will retire after the world championships in Holland next month and devote her full time to finishing college.

The 20-year-old Northbrook, Ill., girl, who now owns Olympic medals of all three colors, she won a silver and a bronze in 1968, attends DuPage Junior College.

Asked what she hoped to do for a career, Dianne said, "I don't know."

She's an expert at waiting on tables. That's the way she picks up extra money to help her training expenses.

Ard Schenk, the flying Dutchman who won three gold medals in speed skating, is attracting the attention of pro hockey scouts.

From Chicago comes word that the Chicago Black Hawks have placed the skating whiz on its negotiation list in the National Hockey League.

Although he's never played hockey, Schenk is a superb athlete and skater. He once played goal on the national amateur soccer team.

Annie Famose, veteran French ski star, was suspended by the International Ski Federation Wednesday night as controversy arose again at the Winter Olympics.

The action was taken because of French newspaper advertisements announcing that the 27-year-old skier would work for Radio-Television Luxembourg during the Games.

Miss Famose, who finished eighth in the women's downhill last Friday, was given until 2 p.m. Thursday, Japanese time, midnight EST, to produce evidence that she had not violated the rules of amateurism.

Marc Hodler, president of FIS, said the suspension would be applied indefinitely if she failed to comply.

He added that similar charges against another French ski star, Patrick Russel, had been investigated. No action had been taken against Russel yet, Hodler said, because he is not in Sapporo. Russel missed the Olympics because of a fractured leg.

The announcement was the second stage of the crackdown on professionalism which led to Austrian ski star Karl Schranz' disqualification by the International Olympic Committee on the eve of the Games.

Schranz was banned because he had made money from advertising. The IOC at the same time called on FIS to investigate similar charges against other skiers.

In Paris, a Radio Luxembourg spokesman said it was "stupified" by the suspension of Miss Famose, because they considered she was only being "interviewed" by the station and not reporting for it.

"The story goes back to before the Games," Jacques Chapus, news director of the station said. "Annie wasn't supposed to participate and we thought we would offer her a trip to Sapporo. She also agreed to give us interviews."

French women skiers ran into trouble and she qualified unexpectedly for the team and the trip here. The station said it did not pay her way.

However, Miss Famose told Chapus, "because you have been so nice, I don't see why we don't go ahead with the interviews anyway."

"That's the story," Chapus said. He said the same situation applied to Russel.

VOLUME XCIX, ISSUE 87 UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1972

Fac Sen Backs Athletic Council Change

By JOHN LEWIS

After many weeks of debate, compromise and controversy, the Faculty-Senate voted 44-26 yesterday to support the Student Senate's bill to restructure the Athletic Council. The bill will decrease alumni representation from four members to on while increasing the student representation from one to five. Faculty representation on the Council will increase by one, from four to five.

The Faculty-Senate, at their last meeting, had voted down the proposed amendment but a controversy arose when it was discovered that the votes listed as abstentions were counted as votes against the amendment. This called for consultation with Parliamentary regulations as to the legitimacy of viewing the abstained votes as negative and also whether or not another vote should be held.

Thsi controversy was finally settled with the agreement that abstained votes should not be tallied at all and that another vote was in order. This decision was followed by the continuing debate over the proposed amendment itself.

Professor Spindler of the Agricultural Economics department stated that he was unwilling to have students run the Council and that he was in favor of alumni participation in the program.

"Basically, it (the Council) is excellent. Why tamper with that excellence?"

In opposition to that view Professor Denny of the Art Department stated that undergraduate athletics are run for the undergraduate not for the alumni. He stated, in fact, that the Athletic Council "is not an academic program and should not be dealt with by the Faculty-Senate."

Lee Sandwen, President of the Student-Senate, commented, "The Athletic Council is an advisory board and it cannot change the administration. It is difficult for one student, me, to represent the rest of the students."

The motion was then made to vote on the amendment. Abstention votes, it was made clear, would not be counted. It was also noted that a three-fifths majority would be required to pass the amendment. The results were forty-four in favor and twenty-six opposed. Forty-two votes in favor was the minimum passage. In order to get into effect the bill must now pass a vote by the full faculty and then be granted final approval by the Board of Trustees.

In other Faculty-Senate business administative representative Dean Bishoff stated that the university budget is going to be down compared to last year. Therefore, a total freeze was declared on all new positions in the university and a partial freeze was placed on replacement positions. He also stated that seventy per cent of the eligible faculty will get merit increases.

After this, Student Senate President Sandwen, who had just returned from a special meeting of the trustees in Boston, stated that the university will have to decide whether or not to admit the announced ratio of new students or, because of the financial problems of the state, to decrease this ratio.

At this point, the chairman recognized a veteran student who had obtained permission to present his problems and ideas for change to the Faculty-Senate. He stated that the university academic curricula was not geared to the needs of a veteran. Specifically, he said that he and others like him were "...being taught down to," and that he was not presented with any challenge. His proposal was for the creation of a Committee on Veteran Affairs which he suggested would be composed of four veterans and four "conservative" faculty members.

Chairman Booth agreed to consider this proposal at a future meeting of the Faculty-Senate.

SUG Board Elections

By STEVE TRIPOLI

Proclaiming that "Students are our real power on Campus" Barry Cohen, an undergraduate, was last night elected chairman of the Student Union Governing Board, defeating graduate student John Barbaro by a 10-7 vote. One of the main points of Cohen's pre-election speech was that he was trying to give the members of the Board a choice between an undergraduate and a graduate student candidate.

Other posts to be filled were those of Vice-Chairman, filled by Lisa Mandell running unopposed, and Secretary Treasurer, filled by Richard Nelson, also running unopposed. These will be the officers of the Board for the next year.

Wallace To Run Here

BOSTON (AP)—Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama, whose name is on the ballot for the April 25 Massachusetts presidential primary, Thursday told the secretary of state he was a candidate in the election.

Wallace's name was listed on the party ballot under a state law which requires that the secretary of state include on it candidates or potential candidates widely mentioned in the national news media.

Secretary of State John F.X. Davoren, who held Wallace's name off his initial listing Jan. 17, put it on as a Democrat before the deadline Feb. 5.

A spokesman said the name had not originally been included because Davoren had not determined whether Wallace was seeking office as a Democrat or whether he would run on a third party ticket.

Davoren received a letter from Wallace which said, in part, "We hope that in the light of our effort in the Florida presidential primary and having been chosen to be on the ballots in Rhode Island, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Pennsylvania and West Virginia, you would consider our candidacy as a significant national candidacy also. Based upon the foregoing facts we respectfully ask that our name be placed on your Democratic presidential primary ballot."

Mistreatment At Hampden School

A suit will be filed in Boston seeking a restraining order barring alleged physical mistreatment of nine juvenile inmates at the Hampden County Training School in Feeding Hills and seeking their immediate release.

The suit to be filed in U.S. District Court by Stephen W. Silverman, counsel for the Hampden County Civil Liberties Union, also asks that a neutral observer be appointed to monitor the school.

The suit was being filed by Silverman in behalf of the nine juveniles and listed Sam Tyler, III, head of the Massachusetts Council of Crime and Correction, as a plaintiff with the youths.

Tyler visited the school during the day along with county Commissioner Armando Dimauro and The Rev. Paul Engle, who runs a settlement house. The three looked over conditions at the school and gathered affidavits from nine of the inmates, Tyler said.

"If one-tenth of the material in those affidavits is truth, there is enough there to send several of the staff members of the county training school to jail for criminal assault," Tyler said.

"All say they've been abused, either hit with a fist or an instrument such as a leather strap or broom handle," Tyler said. "The minority group members - blacks and Puerto Ricans - say they have been subjected to racial insults."

Tyler said the group also gathered affidavits from seven boys recently released from the school "affidavits which show a clear pattern of assault, verbal and physical harrassment and such inhumane acts as forcing kids to eat their own vomit." Tyler said he turned copies of the affidavits over to the district attorney who was instructed by the county commissioners Tuesday night to investigate the school, located at a 400-acre farm.

Det. Lt. James J. Fitzgibbon, who is attached to the office of Dist. Atty. Matthew J. Ryan, Jr., also was at the school on Wednesday.

Tyler said the school, run by the county, has a staff of 18 and a budget of $200,000 a year. Tyler said inmate population was down to four boys last summer.

The council is a private, nonprofit organization headquartered in Boston.

Earlier in the day, Philip H. Lauro, a staff member of Neighborhood Legal Services in Springfield, said that that organization had planned to file similar suits in Boston next week.

Lauro, a third-year law student at Western New England College, said he was working with NLS staff attorney Francis X. Spina in the preparation of the suits.

The federal avenue for redress of alleged grievances was taken because the children's constitutional rights are involved, Lauro said.

Copies of affidavits from the children were turned over to Dist. Atty. Ryan as well.

Tyler, Fr. Engle, Dimauro, Lt. Fitzgibbon all talked with boys at the school Wednesday.

Dimauro said last night that he and Fr. Engle, president of Downey Side Homes, Inc., would be willing to participate as observers at the school.

Dimauro contacted the office of Gov. Sargent Wednesday in connection with the school, but the governor said parole authority did not rest with him.

He said he would explore what role he could play.

The governor called the present system of committing youngsters to institutions for school-related offenses of truancy, absenteeism and social misbehavior as "archaic."

Sargent said he supported replacing institutional treatment with community-based care.

Dock Strike Talks Continue

SAN FRANCISCO (AP)-A mediator kept West Coast docks strike negotiators working Thursday on non-economic issues still unresolved in the tentative agreement announced for ending the 126-day strike.

The Teamsters Union has said it will fight by court action or strike a key agreement provision seeking to end a jurisdiction conflict between teamsters and the longshore union.

Sam Kagel, a veteran private arbitrator of Pacific longshore contract disputes, continued sessions with the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and employer Pacific Maritime Association.

On Tuesday Kagel announced tentative agreement including accord on all economic issues. He said remaining issues would be mediated or, if that failed, he would arbitrate a settlement.

On Wednesday, Congress gave President Nixon authority to end the walkout with binding arbitration of the issues. The White House said it would withhold action pending ILWU and PMA action on a settlement.

The ILWU's 110-member longshore caucus is to decide here Saturday whether the 13,000 strikers will return to work pending ratification of an agreement.

The caucus of delegates from locals in all 24 closed Pacific ports also will set a date for a ratification vote. The PMA is expected to announce a special ratification meeting for its 122 member firms after the ILWU caucus.

Albert Brundage, Teamster attorney, said in Los Angeles Wednesday that the agreement apparently means "that employers will be encouraged to take jobs away from the Teamsters."

He said if this is correct, "Then it is an unsatisfactory contract which will lead to action by the Teamsters."

Brundage declared the jurisdictional issue is "far from resolved as long as our members face a loss of jobs because of a contract between the PMA and the ILWU."

Cop Shoots Roxbury Youth

BOSTON (AP)—A Roxbury youth died this morning after he was shot in the chest when stopped for a traffic violation.

Police said Detective Richard Armstead stopped a vehicle driven by Cornell Thomas, 19, and containing three other youths in the Dorchester section when he saw the vehicle going the wrong way on a one-way street.

Police said Armstead stopped the car and asked Thomas for his license, and the vehicle began to move forward. Armstead, fearing that he would be crushed between the vehicle and his own car, pulled his gun and shot Thomas once, police said.

Sandwen Censured For "Inaction"

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

Lee Sandwen and Kevin Carmen, the two students on the University's Board of Trustees, were condemned last night by the Student Senate Executive Committee for "inaction" in the Freda Salzman case.

The Committee also passed a resolution in support of Dr. Salzman, urging that she be "immediately reinstated to the faculty on that campus (UMass Boston) with tenure and full pay."

Reacting to the condemnation, Lee Sandwen, Student Senate President, and Trustee, replied, "I am distressed with the Committee's attitude towards my performance as a Trustee in this matter. I have been planning a public reply to the President's Office and to the other Trustee's on this matter. I will of course represent to the best of my ability the opinion of the Senate to the Trustees this month."

Dr. Salzman, a faculty member at UMass Boston was denied tenure and subsequently not rehired in the fall of 1969. Her case, involving charges of nepotism has been before the Board of Trustees since that time.

She refused a job offer given to her at the last Board of Trustees meeting in January, calling it, "unsatisfactory." Her case will be brought up again at the next Trustees meeting, scheduled for February 24th.

Asked why the two student Trustees were censured Senate Vice-President Larry Ladd said, "We did not want our student trustees to sit idly by while the Board perpetuates the injustice against Ms. Salzman."

Chet Richardson, Chairman of the Financial Affairs Committee commented, "we wanted to show our support for our fellow students at UMass Boston. It was the feeling of the committee that he should have acted on his own, without the Committee prodding him. Because of the nature of the issue and the fact that the University Senate at UMass Boston had already shown their support for Professor Salzman."

Other issues discussed at the meeting were what kind of action the Rents and Fees Committee might take if dorm rents or fees were raised on campus.

Youths Attack Warden

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) - The Hampden County Commission was to meet in special session yesterday to discuss Wednesday night's attack on Hampden County Training School Director Thomas F. Reidy, 64.

Meanwhile, legislative and legal action was underway to halt alleged brutality against the school's 11 inmates.

Reidy required Springfield Hospital Medical Center treatment for facial cuts and bruises on the ribs and legs after three assailants attacked him on the steps of his home, adjacent to the school in Feeding Hills.

Police said Reidy fought off the attackers, including two juveniles, went into his house, and came out with an unloaded shotgun to scare them off.

Agawam police apprehended the trio, plus two other juveniles, outside the school.

Scheduled for Springfield District Court arraignment today on a drunkenness charge was Thomas J. Frazier, 32, a Springfield carpenter, according to police, who also said Frazier was an inmate at the school 20 years ago.

Reidy is expected to fill assault and battery charges against Frazier and two of the juveniles today, police said.

JOE Successful Says Gage

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

The JOE program has been "remarkably successful," sad Dr. Robert W. Gage, vice-chancellor for student affairs, during an MDC interview yesterday.

Gage said that according to the information he has received, less than 10% of the youths involved in the program have gotten into "significant difficulty". Compare this with the fact that 70% of the youths who are released from such institutions as detention centers, return to these same institutions within 90 days, he said.

Today marks the end of the four-week old JOE program. It is expected next Monday that Director Larry Dye will announce at a news conference that all but a few of the JOE youths have been placed in foster homes.

An encouraging aspect of the JOE program, said Gage, has been the fact that a large percentage of youths have been able to establish reasonable communication with their parents.

"The advocates have become intermediaries in re-establishing communication between the youths and the parents," he said.

About criticisms against the JOE program by Univerity student, Gage replied, "I think a program like this carries with it a certain degree of risk for the students and the (JOE) youths."

As Gage sees it there is now a double standard for behavior. He told the MDC: "There is a difference between the behavior we expect from the (JOE) youths and the behavior we expect from the students.

"We tell them that this has got to succeed; this is your last chance, we can't permit you to make mistakes."

Gage also attacked the role of politicians in the JOE program. He said the "petty personal interests of politicians" may be defined as being "basically immoral. It is immoral to use someone else for your own interests."

Asked to list the one change he would like to see in the JOE program, Gage replied, that a basic thing would be more time for "thoughtful preparation of advocates and more time for the matching of advocates with youths." But, explained Gage, it is necessary to act quickly in these affairs. Therefore, long-range planning is difficult.

The UMass Security Department has been "very understanding" said Gage. It has worked closely with the youths.

Gage said he would like to see the JOE program expand. "I would hope that selected schools would pick up on this type of program," he said.

Commenting on the effectiveness of the UMass campus in dealing with the JOE program, Gage stated that the campus has the advantage of being reltively isolated. He considers it important to isolate the youths from the environment which has resulted in their problems.

Gage said it is necessary to generate new interests in the youths. This, said Gage, is the heart of rehabilitation.

Beauty Pageant Opens In Northampton

by MAUREEN MEISTER

Applications are now available to female residents or registered students of Hampshire County who wish to enter the Miss Northampton Scholarship Pageant. Entering the pageant is the preliminary step to the Miss America Pageant in Atlantic City, N.J.

Contest entrants must be single, high school graduates, and citizens of the United States.

Interested young women between the ages of 18 and 28 may obtain applications from the Kiwanis Club of Northampton, sponsor of the contest, by calling club president Herb Loretan at 584-9570. Applications must be in by February 21.

The pageant will be held March 3 at Northampton High School and will feature special guests Laurie Lee Shaefer, the current Miss America and Debbie O'Brian, Miss Massachusetts. The winner will receive a minimum of $250 in scholarship money, and the first and second runners-up will receive lesser amounts.

More than $850,000 in scholarship funds are awarded annually at the local, state and national Miss America Pageants--the largest scholarship foundation in the world for young women.

Unlike most beauty contests, the Miss America Pageant has distinguished itself by requiring its contestants to give a talent presentation. The girls are also judged in a swimsuit competition and an evening gown competition.

The Miss America Pageant is a non-profit civic corporation which has been conducted since 1921 during Labor Day week.

Marriage Talk At Smith

A forum entitled "Questions about Marriage" will be held at Smith College Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of next week. Sponsored by the religious organizations at Smith, all interested persons are welcome to attend.

Keynote speaker will be well-known writer Ashley Montagu who will speak Monday at 7:30 p.m. in Sage Hall. His topic, "Does Marriage Have a Future?," will consider the evolution of marriage and what alternative unions are presented in a changing social environment.

Nixon Says "No More Concessions"

WASHINGTON (AP)-President Nixon said Thursday "there will be no further concessions on our part" at the Vietnam peace talks unless Hanoi, in his view, agrees to negotiate seriously.

This was but on item in a 45-minute unannounced-in-advance news conference that Nixon began by saying he will leave Washington for Communist China next Thursday.

Talking without interruption for about 15 minutes at the outset, Nixon said his meetings with Chinese leaders would represent more of a dialogue than negotiations because "we are in truth at a beginning."

Nixon was asked if he felt it was fair to the voters and rival would-be presidential candidates to expect no presentation dates to expect no presentation of alternatives to the eight-point Vietnam peace proposal he unveiled before a nationwide television audience Jan. 25.

Nixon responded: "All have a right to say what they want. They must decide if it is right to say it."

Nixon said that while out of office, he had many objections to Vietnam policy but that as the Republican presidential candidate in 1968 he vowed he would say nothing to jeopardize peace efforts.

Nixon said some of his Vietnam critics-and he was talking in the context of rivals for the White House-might be encouraging the enemy in his cause rather than "encouraging him to end the war."

He said "various presidential candidates saw fit to propose a solution that went beyond" his Jan. 25 plan.

He said this might have the inevitable effect of encouraging Hanoi to stall peace talks and wait out November's U.S. election.

Nixon talked about halting further concessions to Hanoi under present circumstances in discussing a Saigon news conference Thursday in which President Ngyuyen Van Thieu suggested there is a split between his government and the United States over the latest Nixon peace proposal.

Nixon said that all Paris peace proposals by the allies have had joint Washington-Saigon approval. He added: Any future proposals that will be made will be joint proposals of the government of the United States and the government of South Vietnam.

He described as courageous Thieu's announcement, simultaneous with the unveiling of the eight-point Nixon plan, that the South Vietnamese chief would voluntarily resign a month before any new elections resulting from a peace settlement.

Of the Paris talks, Nixon said Hanoi has not responded to his eight points and declared, "We are ready to negotiate." But he added "There will be no further concessions on our part" until or unless the other side joins in genuine negotiations.

The President, in his opening announcement, said that during his China visit, he and the leaders of the two countries will issue a joint communique on substantive matters.

He reported that his itinerary "is being kept flexible," and added, "there will not be a great deal of what I would call...sightseeing."

The President went on:

"We have both agreed that...first priority must be given to our talks."

Criticized by many on the right flank of the Republican party for his overtures to Peking, Nixon said without referring to critics, "This trip should not be one that should create very great optimism or great pessimism."

He added, however, that "it will mark a watershed...a new chapter" in relations between the United States and mainland China.

He said he hoped that chapter would be one of new communication, negotiations rather than confrontation and the avoidance of armed conflict.

The President was asked if he might, while in China, offer American aid to that country.

He declined to give a straightaway answer, saying it "involves the agenda items," but said that if he is asked about the subject while in China, "I will have an answer."

British Expect I.R.A. Step-up

BELFAST (AP)-British authorities have forecast a stepup in the Irish Republican Army's guerrilla fight to take over Northern Ireland, involving heightened firepower and greater expertise.

This intensification, they said Thursday night, could be accompanied by more overt Communist exploitation of the Irish struggle and perhaps an attempt to make it an issue between the Atlantic Alliance and the Communist bloc.

These are predictions only, based less on direct evidence than on the deductive reasoning of men skilled in analysis of guerrilla war situations.

As one put it: "These things might never happen, but they would be the logical next step. If they're going to win, they must get better weapons and greater expertise."

These prediction coincide with indications that the nationalist "provisional" wing of the IRA is in process of retraining. Heavier and more sophisticated weapons have been reported on the way to supplant the relatively ineffective large-caliber machine guns which are the IRA's traditional weapon.

Another indication of probable retraining is that Belfast for the past eight days has suffered only two major bomb explosions compared with 10 to 20 a day in the pre-Christmas campaign against the city.

Recent bombs have not only been fewer but less sophisticated. The clear conclusion is that the more skilled bomb designers have been caught up in the province's continuing internment sweeps or have taken time off to learn new techniques.

These techniques, the experts say, probably would involve plastic explosives of the kind which helped drive France out of Algeria. The IRA's current reliance on commercial gelignite has been expensive in terms of casualties. Hardly a week passes without at least one bomb planter blowing himself to pieces.

Open Communist involvement with the IRA campaign so far has largely been limited to political guidance for the leftist "official" wing of the movement and activity alongside IRA intellectuals in the leadership of the Roman Catholic-based civil rights campaign. Of all the weapons seized in Belfast, not one was of Communist origin though an attempt to ship in Czechoslovak arms last year was thwarted.

Singer To Testify On Irving

NEW YORK (AP) — Nina van Pallandt flew in from London Thursday after having vowed "to tell the truth about Clifford Irving, even if it means him going to jail."

On arrival at Kennedy Airport, she told reporters, "I do not want to answer any questions."

The blonde Danish cabaret singer is scheduled to testify Monday before a federal grand jury probing possible mail fraud in the mystery surrounding Irving's purported autobiography of billionaire Howard Hughes.

Irving claims he collected the material in 100 hours of meetings with Hughes and that one of them was in Mexico just a year ago.

Miss van Pallandt, who has said she loves Irving, disputes that claim, saying she was with Irving on the Mexican trip and that he could not have met Hughes during the less than two hours they were apart.

The cabaret singer, estranged wife of a Dutch baron, made her pledge to tell the whole truth through her manager John Marshall before leaving London.

The fraud question was also being investigated in Zurich, Switzerland, where Robert G. Morville, chief of the criminal division in the U.S. attorney's office, and Asst. U.S. Atty. John J. Tigue, Jr., arrived earlier in the day. They were trying to clarify just what happened to $650,000 intended for Hughes, but deposited in banks there by a woman Irving has acknowledged is his wife, Edith.

The money was paid by the McGraw-Hill Publishing Co. to Irving for relay to Hughes as advance payment for rights to the book. A voice purporting to be that of Hughes said in a telephone interview with a group of reporters that he had never received it.

Irving later admitted that his wife Edith, using the name "Helga R. Hughes," endorsed the three checks making up the amount "H.R. Hughes" and deposited them in a Zurich bank under that name. She later is said to have withdrawn the money and put $442,000 of it in another bank calling herself Hannah Rosenkrantz, the name of her previous husband's present wife.

The U.S. prosecutors said they went to Zurich in connection with statements made by Mrs. Irving to the grand jury. This appeared to conflict with other reports that she had pleaded the Fifth Amendment to avoid self-incrimination.

A Swiss district attorney, Dr. Peter Veleff, said no new details of the Swiss probe could be disclosed.

Miss van Pallandt, wearing a beige dress and green scarf, said "I'm flabbergasted" when asked what she thought of the publicity the mystery has received.

Then, as reporters fired a barrage of questions at her, she tossed her blonde hair, said "This is ridiculous," and swept back into the closed-off customs section.

Although the federal grand jury is in recess while the two men from the U.S. Attorney's office are in Switzerland, the Manhattan district attorney's office announced a New York County grand jury would begin its own investigation, Friday.

It will look into possible grand larceny, forgery and perjury. Asst. Dist. Atty. Leonard Newman of the fraud division will lead the investigation.

Court sources said Miss van Pallandt would not be called, nor would other major figures in the case.

AT HOME--Danish folk singer Nina Van Pallandt, friend of Clifford Irving who has written a disputed "autobiography" of Howard Hughes, relaxes in a home near London in this photograph taken Feb. 5. She is scheduled to appear Friday before a grand jury looking into the Hughes book. (AP)

Lindsay Attacks Nixon

BOSTON (AP) — New York Mayor John V. Lindsay said Thursday that if President Nixon believes his war critics have committed treason "then let him explain that belief openly and honestly to the American people."

In a speech prepared for delivery at the Lithuanian Citizens Club, Lindsay said, "I am willing to fight him Nixon on that belief tooth and nail-because I think that to continue to wipe out countless lives in defense of a wretched and corrupt government is insane."

"That government is not worth one more day, and not one more drop of blood to any of us-Americans or Asian," he said.

Lindsay, a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, said a statement of "one of these anonymous men who held great power" that Nixon's war critics were "consciously aiding and abetting the enemy" expressed the real beliefs of Nixon.

He did not identify the "anonymous man."

On Monday, White House staff chief H.R. Haldeman said Nixon's war critics are "consciously" aiding the enemy.

"I was wondering who Mr. Nixon...thinks is the enemy we are aiding and abetting," Lindsay said. "I knew in my own mind whom I am trying to aid and abet.

"I want to aid the surviving Vietnamese and Cambodians and Laotians...I want to aid and abet the 100,000 Americans to get out of Vietnam without losing their arms or legs or their sight...I want to aid and abet to hundreds of Americans languishing in prison camps or missing-and hopefully still alive-in the jungles of Southeast Asia," he said.

The mayor called "a reprehensible act" America's decision "to stand mute and silent while the government of Pakistan slaughtered the people of Bengal."

"And to refuse, even now, to recognize the reality of Bengladesh, after all of that struggle and bloodshed, is nothing less than diplomatic cowardice," he said.

"I happen to think that the refusal of the United States to speak out in support of those who struggle for basic social justice in Ulster Northern Ireland is indefensible," he said.

"Our government should speak out," he said. "But it also raises a question. For how can we expect the world to listen to our calls for justice and the return of civil rights, and an end to military violence, until we have had the courage to admit our own wrongs in Vietnam?"

Pacific Airpower Buildup

WASHINGTON (AP) - The sudden buildup of U.S. airpower in the Western Pacific suggests the United States has less than full confidence that the South Vietnamese army can adequately protect the remaining Amercan troops in Vietnam during any major new offensive.

It also backs up President Nixon's warning to Hanoi that "I shall fully meet my responsibility...to protect our remaining troops" in the event of a North Vietnamese offensive.

The movement of nearly 40 huge Air Force B52 bombers from U.S. bases to Guam, in range of Vietnam, and a third Navy aircraft carrier into the Gulf of Tonkin came only a few days before the Tet lunar new year.

For weeks, intelligence reports have indicated the enemy was moving troops into position and otherwise preparing to launch possibly widespread attacks in Vietnam starting about Tet, which falls on Feb. 15.

As the U.S. withdrawal has progressed at an accelerated pace, American troops and bases in Vietnam have become increasingly vulnerable.

U.S. ground combat strength, once about 10 divisions, has been cut to 11 battalions for security duty. The bulk of the 133,000 U.S. troops left in Vietnam are trained chiefly for logistics and other support functions, not for infantry duty.

Along with the reduction in ground combat strength, the United States has been scaling down its airpower in Southeast Asia.

For the record, U.S. officials from Nixon on down have voiced confidence in the ability of the South Vietnamese army to "handle the North Vietnamese challenge."

New Tax Gains Momentum

WASHINGTON (AP) - Administration officials gave an advisory commission Thursday favorable assessments of the value added tax But they said President Nixon has not decided to propose this form of sales tax to help finance education.

The Advisory Committee on Intergovernmental Relations, which was asked by Nixon to look into the possibility and make recommendations, held its first session on the subject with Elliot Richardson, secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, as the main witness.

The proposal is for a federal value added tax that would yield about $18 billion annually.

Commission chairman Robert E. Merriam estimated the commission would take from six months to a year to complete its studies and draw up its recommendations. Such a timetable would rule out any final action by Congress at this session on a new tax.

Sargent Plans Air Cleanup

BOSTON (AP)-The chief of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency says Gov. Francis W. Sargent has expressed concern about the cost to industry of cleaning up air pollution.

William D. Ruckelshaus told a news conference Thursday Massachusetts has filed a plan with his agency for implementing an air cleanup program.

He said the plan involves state determination of what it can do to produce cleaner air.

"The necessary fact of the cost itself is not a legitimate reason under the statute for delay of the plan," he said.

Ruckelshaus commented shortly after private conference with the Republican governor at the State House. The federal official is on a brief visit to New England.

He noted that Sargent two weeks ago asked for a two year delay on meeting emmission standards for automobiles, and 18 month delay in meeting secondary air pollution standards.

He said there had been similar requests from 21 states.

The federal official termed the idea of a tax on industries which give off sulphur contaminants in the air "an additional tool" to insure that standards are met.

He said there had been similar requests from 21 states.

The federal official termed the idea of a tax on industries which give off sulphur contaminants in the air "an additional tool" to insure that standards are met.

Ruckelshaus said the government has begun intensive studies in six cities, including Los Angeles, Philadelphia and Denver, on ways to cut pollutants from automobiles.

"There are all kinds of schemes," he said, "from car pooling to staggered work hours to increase use of mass transit."

The administrator said the immediate problem is how auto makers meet the standards set for 1975. He noted they have asked for a one year delay on the requirement to cut pollutants 90 per cent.

"I think it is probably unwise to impose standards on the automobile industry without a real effort" to create alternate transportation methods," he said.

Ruckelshaus said the Nixon administration has supported proposed use of some Highway Trust Fund money for mass transit needs.

He said his agency has no intention of seeking to curb the use of automobiles in certain communities.

Ruckelshaus said one of the problems in dealing with solid waste is finding markets for recycled material.

He added, "In my opinion, for the federal government to go into a massive construction program" to cope with solid waste "would be a massive mistake."

Boston Controls Noise

BOSTON (AP)—Boston's Air Pollution Control Commission issued Thursday preliminary noise control regulations aimed at making the streets much quieter.

The regulations set maximum levels of noise-measured in decibels-which will be permitted in a given neighborhood. Residential areas must be quieter than business districts.

The amounts of noise emitted by new vehicles and equipment are also included in the standards, the first to be adopted in the East, said David Standley, executive director of the commission.

Most sounds fall between the 20 decibels of a whisper and the 140 of a jet airplane at take-off. Permissible levels will be somewhere in the middle.

Sixty decibels will be allowed in residential areas during the day, 50 at night. Commercial zones would be allowed five decibels above those figures.

Heavy traffic has a rating of 60 decibels, too much under the regulations for any section at night.

A single motorcycle would present a real problem.

ConEd Up Price

BOSTON (AP)-Boston Edison Co. filed a request Thursday with the state Department of Public Utilities for a $42 million general rate increase.

President Thomas J. Galligan Jr., citing cost increases, said the company had "no alternative but to file for a general rate increase. The new rates are also necessary to provide additional facilities to meet customer demands and maintain quality of service."

A company spokesman, Thomas J. Lane, manager of public information, said an order Thursday from the federal Price Commission putting a temporary nationwide freeze on such rate increases was not expected "to affect us at all."

"The DPU would not be expected to act on our request within the 30 days of the freeze. As far as Phase 2 is concerned, we believe we are meeting all existing guidelines for asking for the increase in rates," Lane said.

John R. Verani, chairman of the DPU, said the rate increases would not go into effect until "the maximum 10 months allowed by law."

During that time, Verani said, "the Public Utilities Department will conduct an investigation to determine the propriety of the request and will conduct public hearings at dates to be announced later."

In his statement, Galligan said: "It has been 13 years since we have had a general rate increase, and in fact we have had rate reductions in both 1964 and 1966 that amounted to more than $5.6 million annually based on kilowatt hour usage in those years."

"Edison's operating and financial expenses have increased over 100 percent during the last ten years due to spiraling inflationary costs such as a 136 per cent increase in municipal property taxes and a construction program that has exceeded $680 million since 1959," Galligan said.

"Edison's local property taxes as a percentage of base revenues and fuel costs due to environmental regulations are among the highest in the nation," he said. "Construction costs are expected to exceed $100 million in 1972, and over a five-year period are expected to surpass $600 million."

Galligan said the new rates would mean an average rise in costs for residential customers of 8.4 cents a day. He said commercial and industrial customers could expect an increase of about 20 per cent.

Edison has 500,000 customers in 40 cities and towns in the metropolitan Boston area.

Hicks Seat Challenged

BOSTON (AP)-Republican state committeeman Ronald T. McDonald, 34, of Norwood, today announced his candidacy for the 9th Congressional District seat now held by Democrat Louise Day Hicks.

The district was stripped of some of its heavily Democratic Boston wards in last year's redistricting.

The legislature added several suburban towns to the district to replace the Boston area lost. In addition to parts of Boston, the 9th includes the towns of Canton, Dedham, Dover, Needham, Norwood, Walpole and Westwood.

McDonald, chairman of the board of the ICBM Corporation, also is chairman of the 50-member Industrial Advisory Council for Action for Boston Community Development.

Sarge Issues Safety Message

HAVERHILL, Mass. (AP) - Gov. Francis W. Sargent said Thursday he will issue "a major public safety message" which includes legislation for tighter gun control and an overhaul of police training programs in the state.

Sargent's proposals were to be given to the legislature Friday.

He said he also will take administrative action to put into operation a program which will provide every organized police department access to a "completely automated, high-speed communications and information retrieval system."

The gun control legislation would extend to former inmates of houses of correction the five-year ban on ownership of guns by felons released from state penitentiaries.

Sargent said it also would realign state laws governing the rights of aliens to own guns to bring them into line with federal law.

He spoke at a meeting of city civil clubs.

Sargent will propose a "comprehensive program of statewide, state-sponsored training and certification" for police officers.

"New laws setting gun regulations are vital," he said, "but when all is said and done, the front line in the war against crime is still the police officer on the street."

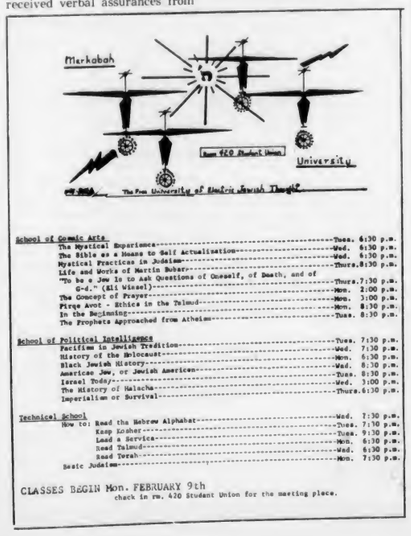
"His knowledge and his capacity to use the tools provided is what counts," the governor said.

Local property taxes finance the 17 local academies for initial training of police recruits, Sargent said, and "the quality of police training has therefore depended upon a local community's ability to pay."

His legislation will place police training programs in the hands of the Massachusetts Police Training Council.

By 1973, Sargent said, the state will have at least five state-run regional academies in operation.

Bell Says No To Price Freeze



BOSTON (AP) - A spokesman for New England Telephone Co. said Thursday the Price Commission order for a temporary nationwide freeze on rates charged by privately owned utilities was not expected to affect its $65.6 million rate hike.

The increase went into effect Tuesday.

A spokesman for the company said New England Telephone received verbal assurances from the staff of the Price Commission on Feb. 4 that "the Price Commission chooses not to intercede" in the rate increase.

The Price Commission freeze, announced Thursday, suspends rate increases that would have gone into effect legally after midnight Wednesday.

The commission said the freeze could run as long as to March 10 but could end sooner.

Election Year Boost For Economy

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP)-Nobel prize-winning economist Dr. Paul A. Samuelson Thursday predicted an economic upturn in 1972 and said, "I wish we could have elections every year."

He said election years bring "more humane, more pragmatic and more responsive policies."

Here for an economic seminar, the 1970 Nobel laureate said, "1972 will be a better year than 1971, but not as good as President Nixon predicts."

An economics professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Samuelson predicted an end to Phase 2 wage and price controls after the November election.

"It is very hard to get the American people to stay with a mandatory wage and price control. People will get fed up," he said.

Dr. Pierre A. Rinfret, president of Rinfret-Boston associates, an international economic and financial constitution firm. He predicted that the free enterprise system that created America's "highest standard of living and greatest economic system," will come to an end in the next decade, to be replaced by greater government control.

"When you kill the free enterprise system in this country, you kill the goose that laid the golden egg," said Rinfret, whose analyses have been used by Presidents Johnson and Nixon.

Samuelson praised President Nixon for "changing his mind" on the economy in 1971, but said more than rhetoric is needed to make the administration's "rosey forecasts" work in 1972.

He predicted a drop in unemployment from the current 5.9 per cent to 5.3-5.5 per cent, more than the 5 per cent predicted by the administration.

"I think these figures are serious because when the nation's average is 6 per cent, the rate for unskilled workers is 12 to 15 per cent, and minority workers who are unskilled are closer to 20 per cent, while young blacks in the inner-city are 25 to 30 per cent. That's dynamite," sud the former adviser to President Kennedy.

Samuelson said that in New England, new jobs must be found to replace the faltering aerospace and electronics industries. "The best pattern for the future is Manchester, N.H., where they replaced one outdated textile operation with 100 small industries. But, he added, "New England is not an island unto itself, and we can't have a tremendous upswing with the rest of the country in a tailspin. Our highest hopes rest upon Congress and the President. We need dollar-spending steam."

Rinfret said the nation's economy has great capacity for growth in 1972, and he praised Wednesday's announcement from Dr. Arthur Burns, chairman of the Federal Reserve System, that the government would pump new money into economic expansion.

But a government-directed economy drew Rinfret's criticisms, along with his prediction of the decline of free enterprise.

"Much of industry has lost its courage. They don't fight any more. They don't take long strikes any more. They are slowly giving in, in one sector after another," he said.

"There's a demise of people that believe in the profit motive. Most middle managers, those people, around 35, who are destined to take over control of big business, are not quite sure they still believe in the profit system, he added, noting a new genre of management concerned about ecology and social problems, as much as profit.

He said three giant monopolies are gaining more and more control over peoples' lives: government, the big corporations, and the four major labor unions.

Well Done

The Collegian would like to congratulate the Faculty Senate on their passing of the Athletic Council motion. Now we can only hope that the faculty as a whole and the Board of Trustees will view the issue in the same enlightened manner.

Hopefully the Faculty Senate's action of yesterday will be one step towards further co-operation between the students and the faculty in University matters that concern both. The announcement at the meeting of yesterday where it was disclosed that, according to the Governors budget, no new positions will be open at the University for fiscal 1972-73 could better be contested if both students and faculty are united.

The same holds true for such matters as academic reform. We all know that it is long overdue. Changing the University to the four course-four credit system per semester is something we all know is coming, and is needed. It could be accomplished with a minimum of hassle if students and faculty could unite on the issue.

The same holds true for requirements and general academic policy. It would be better for both the students and faculty, and the University as a whole that if instead of fighting one and other we could unite and push for reform as one, instead of separate warring factions.

Where It Itches

Freda Salzman hardly seems the revolutionary type. She is a gentle woman who speaks of her persecution by the university as if conducting quiet conversation about the weather. She could be your mother. In reality, she is a former professor of physics at UMass/Boston who was fired because of one fact and one fact alone: her husband is also a physics professor at that campus.

Our society's systematic oppression of women occasionally produces victims who come to symbolize the totality of that oppression, all out of proportion to the specific case at hand. Such persons become symbols around which we focus our fears and hopes for the future of justice.

The decision to fire Freda Salzman was based on a blatantly discriminatory notion known as the "nepotism" policy. It was never a very firm or specific policy, so that its application came to depend on the personal whims of specific administrators. The idea of the policy was to keep a husband and wife from working in the same general area, or from helping each other with their careers through favoritism. In actual practice, it prevents women from getting jobs they were otherwise qualified to fill.

The case of Freda Salzman has dramatized this injustice. While her husband is now a tenured professor of physics, she is in limbo. After being fired in 1968, she was unemployed until the university recently offered her a 1-1/2 year appointment. She has refused that appointment on the justifiable grounds that she deserves the tenure and back pay she was denied because of the nepotism policy. (That policy has since been drastically reformed. In all probability, Dr. Salzman would have tenure now under the new system.)

Throughout the struggle for her reinstatement, Boston Chancellor Broderick and UMass President Wood responded to her appeals with evasions and smokescreens, denying her the opportunity for a full hearing or even the dignity of a complete statement of the reasons for her dismissal.

As Freda Salzman speaks, she talks softly yet forthrightly of the years of personal uncertainty and indignity at the hands of callous administrators. These men have literally imprisoned her academic talents, merely because she was born a woman and chose to enter into wedlock with a fellow physicist.

Is Ms. Salzman to pay the price for the university's misguided policy of the past? She should not. The Board of Trustees must move immediately to grant her the back pay and tenure she deserves.

But the traditional trustee style has been to ignore problems in the hope that they will go away. Unless under intense public pressure, they will not act. They scratch where it itches. If people on the campuses and in the community at large begin to become aware of the issue of Freda Salzman, the Board will be compelled to act.

Cast Of Characters

WASHINGTON—The Howard Hughes autobiography mystery is moving so fast that most people find it hard to keep up with all the parties involved. As a public service we are printing the cast of characters as they have appeared on the scene. Carry this program with you at all times.

Clifford Irving–handsome, 41-year-old author of the book "Fake," who went to McGraw-Hill and told them he had made a deal with Howard Hughes, the mysterious billionaire to write his autobiography. Irving's credentials were impeccable as he lived on the island of Ibiza in Spain, where no one has ever been known to tell a lie.

McGraw-Hill–the prestigious publishing house which advanced $650,000 for the book and said it would stake the integrity of the firm on the authenticity of the manuscript. The joke around New York is that McGraw-Hill is thinking of changing its name to the Irving Trust Company.

Life magazine–a prestigious magazine which agreed to pay $250,000 for the magazine rights to the autobiography. When asked why they thought they had the real thing, a spokesman said, "We're no Modern Screen. This is the Time-Life Corporation."

Modern Screen–a movie fan magazine which said when informed the Hughes autobiography could be a forgery, "We're not Life magazine."

Osborne, Associates–a distinguished handwriting analysis firm which attested to the fact that the correspondence in McGraw-Hill's possession and the signature on the checks matched those of Howard Hughes. Business at the firm has been slow for the past three weeks.

Edith Irving–Clifford Irving's fourth wife. A German-born Swiss citizen whom the Swiss police would like to talk to concerning her role in the affair. At one point Irving said he would sue anyone who linked her to the $650,000 deposited in a Swiss bank.

Helga R. Hughes–no relation to Howard. The woman who opened an account in the Credit Swiss under the name H.R. Hughes and deposited and withdrew the money Irving said he had paid to Howard Hughes. Mr. Irving has admitted his wife was Helga and therefore all lawsuits linking his wife and Helga have been called off.

Hannah Rosencrantz–the woman who opened a bank account after the money was withdrawn from Credit Swiss and placed it in the Swiss Bank Corp., across the street. It is believed she is Edith Irving and Helga Hughes put together.

Nina van Pallandt–a voluptuous Danish singer who says that Clifford Irving is in love with her and took her to Mexico with him when he said he met Howard Hughes. She claims Irving never left her side, which damages Irving's story, not to mention his relations with his wife Edith, as well as Helga and Hannah.

Ann Baxter–A blonde beauty who taught Irving scuba diving in the Virgin Islands, when Edith thought he was taping Howard Hughes.

Howard Hughes–a voice on the telephone who claims he never met Irving and has short fingernails and cuts his own hair.

Hughes has promised to have his photograph taken very soon to show people he is still alive, but Life magazine will not be asked to take the picture.

Martin Ackerman–Clifford Irving's original attorney who, after listening to Irving's story, bowed out as counsel and said, "Irving needs a criminal lawyer."

Richard Suskind–a researcher for Irving who said he saw Hughes in a motel in Palm Springs and Hughes gave him a dried organic prune. The only thing that can save Irving from sure disaster is for Suskind to produce the prune.

The Mirror

By MARK HALLENBECK

Once there was an ugly girl with a big mirror. The mirror had a worn guilt frame and a cracked, smoky surface with large pieces missing. Despite these shortcomings it was fully capable of reflecting the girl's ugliness. It showed her scragly hair, warty nose, pimply face, missing teeth, plump, squat figure and hairy knees. The girl, who was stupid as well as ugly, continually gazed at herself in the mirror hoping against hope for some change in her appearance. Of course no change was forthcoming and, after several years of disappointed and even disgusting viewing, the girl grew angry. "It's your fault, nasty old mirror," she said. "How come you never show my good side? With your smoky surface and spider webs you make me look much worse than I really am. My nice new plastic gown looks all frayed and tattered in your gloomy reflection. Its not! You've contradicted reality. You're lying mirror! The girl grew excited. She shouted, "I'm not that ugly!"

"Ugly, ugly, ugly, ugh," replied the mirror.

"You're quoting me out of context, you liar," she screamed even louder.

"Liar, liar, liar, lie," said the mirror.

"Arrrragh," bellowed the girl. She plucked off her shoe and smashed the mirror into a thousand pieces. When the dust cleared the pieces of mirror lay on the floor of her little hut, each one reflecting part of her ugliness. She swept them up and threw them in the trashbasket. When the trashmen came the next week they found the girl uglier than ever. Without the mirror she had been unable to comb all the snarls out of her hair or smear pimple cream on her ugly face. Indeed when they saw the girl the trashmen ran away screaming, which shows how bad she looked. Soon no one would talk to her, not even her fawning Aunt Alice. The girl was forced to live out the rest of her days in miserable isolation.

Moral: Sometime ugliness is more than skin deep.

'OH, YEAH? WELL, I, TOO, AM A SKYJACKER, AND I, TOO, HAVE A BOMB . . .'

Letters To The Editor

Political Clouds

To the Editor:

Mr. Joseph Krausman espoused a view in his letter of February 10th which is typical of many students today who claim they hold certain values and morals but balk every time a workable plan for implementing them is proposed. He himself stated that he supports Nader's work, but he, as well as others, is seemingly content to flounder along in detached idealism, never producing any effective and long lasting change. WMPIRG is attempting to create a student organization to provide meaningful student interest representation. This particular funding procedure is the way to do it.

Mr. Krausman accused WMPIRG of being a "political organization" and tried to compare it to "the Socialists, Communists, Birchers, Republicans." Unlike those groups, WMPIRG will not support, work for, or endorse any candidate for public office and WMPIRG does not espouse an ideology or dogman. WMPIRG is not political by Mr. Krausman's own definition.

But Mr. Krausman's arguments cloud the real issue. The question is whether the funding procedure is justifiable or not.

The WMPIRG funding method is a compromise between two ideals that the WMPIRG people hold strongly. On the one hand is the desire to create an effective and potent student PIRG, to protect student interests; on the other hand is WMPIRG's wish to keep contributions voluntary. In order to keep WMPIRG from becoming what Laura Emmons terms "a fund raising committee" wasting time and effort on a massive campaign every year, and destroying effectiveness, WMPIRG needs a dependable, inexpensive means of collection. Thus, collecting on the semester bill and refunding to those not wishing to pay is as voluntary as possible a method which maintaining the effectiveness of the organization. Compared to the other taxes students are forced to pay, it is by far the least coercive.

The reason that the tax isn't made a "check-off" on the bill like the Health Insurance is that this method, even if accepted by Whitmore, would cost a tremendous amount of money in changing the format of the bill and yearly processing costs. It would be a waste of money if for every $2 we received, we had to pay up 20¢ just to process it.

The most important point, however, is a point which Mr. Krausman seems to neglect. Unless a substantial majority of the students, say 10,000, endorse the funding procedure, then it will never get passed. "The Socialists, Communists, Birchers, (and) Republicans" should all have their $2 refundable tax, IF they can convince 10,000 students to endorse it.

But Mr. Krausman has a talent for blowing things out of proportion. What he is actually saying is that he is unwilling to spend 5 minutes each semester getting his cash refund, even if 10,000 students want him to, in order to establish an organization to represent student's interests more effectively than they have ever been before.

An Open Letter

To the Student Body:

Taking into account all things, it can safely be said that the Free Concert put on by the Concert Committee was an unqualified success, despite the hassles that you had to contend with from ID's being check at the door (this was one of the ideas of the Concert Committee, and we tried it out as an experiment– again, sorry for the hassle, but we hope you understand.) and the trouble that the groups had with the sound system. (It was a makeshift sound system by the way, with all three groups contributing their equipment. I wish to thank J.D. Mama, Rush, and Clear Sky for their generosity and the fine music they provided for the audience.

However, the main ingredient in this mixture (concoted by Steve Comolli of the Concert Committee out of sheer hard work) was the audience, and its patience and support of the idea that was being fostered in the event-the idea of a high quality, student-run and backed concert to be held in the Spring. The some 1200 (according to estimates made by Gerry Scanlon of Program Council and myself) of the Student Body that attended were a great audience, and made the Concert as good as it was.

The main point of this, however, is to try to keep in you the spirit of Tuesday night. If enough people demand a Concert, if enough people work for a concert, if enough people have an interest in that concert and are willing to come out and support it, physically and psychologically, then you're going to have a concert- and with enough student input, one you'll be proud of too. So speak to everyone you can, gather petitions, write angry letters to the administrators and the Collegian. Let Concert Committee know how you feel (Thursday nights, Campus Center 175 at 9), and work for it. There are some 20,000 people out there; you can move mountains and you can move Whitmore. Again, expressing my thanks and wishing you realization, I remain,

Gary Gomes

And Again...

To the Editor:

In Thursday's (Feb. 10) Collegian a letter was published attacking the two dollar tax that WMPIRG wants added to everyone's student fee. The author of this correspondence, a Mr. Krausman, tells us that this tax is wrong. And as if that statement is not enough, he goes a step further and thrusts this unnatural tax to the height of infamy–it's "unconstitutional" he says.

Mr. Krausman's reason for calling the tax unconstitutional is that nobody could be forced to pay money to a political organization. He is right. Nobody should. The trouble is that WMPIRG is not political. If it is, what candidates does it endorse for political offices? Can anybody tell me WMPIRG's stance on U.S. foreign policy? I mean, if WMPIRG is at all political, it is about as political as a street cleaner, except that besides cleaning streets it is interested in cleaning up the air, the water, and maybe a few shady landlords.

I think Mr. Krausman's confusion lies in the difference between a group that is formed for political purposes–a political group–and a group that has an ideology. Just because WMPIRG holds the belief that something should be done to keep the air fresh and the water clean is no reason to automatically assume that it has been formed for political purposes. I mean, Mr. Krausman, not everybody who wants a clean, healthy environment can justifiably be compared with "Socialists" and "Communists". WMPIRG has an ideology, true, but so doesn't the Football team. As a matter of fact, I think if one looks hard enough one will find that every group on campus has some sort of belief system–an ideology–that holds its members together. I think it is wrong to assume that, because they have a system of beliefs, the people on the swim team are all "Republicans" and therefore the swimming facilities shouldn't be funded any more.

In conclusion I would like to say that Mr. Krausman doesn't have to be worried about being forced to give Ralph Nader two bucks. The first two letters in WMPIRG stand for Western Mass. not Ralph Nader. WMPIRG will be run and funded by the students and should be supported.

Seconds

To the Editor:

Will someone from Food Services please explain why, at the prices we are being charged, it is not feasible to allow seconds to be distributed at their once or twice a semester Steak (or in this case Rib Roast) night? It seems the height of absurdity to make special posters proclaiming the event and go through all kinds of hoopla (special pickle trays, etc.) proclaiming the "special" kind of meal that is being presented and then be petty enough to refuse to serve seconds. Somehow, the benevolence of "Rib Roast Night" escapes me under these circumstances.

Did You Know...

To the Editor:

I was pleased to read the article about the proposed Women's Crew. I hope many women will take the opportunity and use it as a means of entering the dark and forbidding world of the male athlete. Hopefully it will not just be a typical token attempt to appease women, but a sincere attempt to include women in an almost totally male domain. I think of it not just as a athletic experience (did you know women can sweat!) but as a liberating experience for the body and the mind...for once you will use your body to do something. Although I am a runner and my training takes up too much of my time to participate in rowing, I hope many women will go and talk to members of the crew and maybe become the first Women's Crew Team on Campus. I am hoping...

If It's Worthwhile

To the Editor

Last year, University Directions was published as a guide to new students. This year, the booklet is being combined with the Student Handbook and will be produced for all students.

Hopefully, the new publication will be able to retain the informal qualities of "Directions" while at the same time including the official materials from the old handbook that must be published.

A section of the booklet will again deal with student activities. Two months ago, letters were sent to all RSO organizations requesting short descriptions of groups. So far, the response has been poor.

The editors of the booklet therefore request that all RSO groups and any other worthwhile student activity please forward descriptions of their activity, not to exceed four paragraphs. Please send the descriptions to Editor, University Directions, c/o Dean of Students Office, 227 Whitmore, no later than February 25. If nothing new is received, descriptions from last year will probably be used.

Check The Classifieds

To the Editor:

If you read the Collegian yesterday; if you read the small print in the classifieds; near the end, you would have seen an add concerning Men's Liberation. Maybe the cat who put it in is crazy. I've never heard of such a thing before. But it made me think about why there's a Women's liberation and not a Men's. It made me wonder about who is oppressed and what (in reality) constitutes oppression. If you realize that you are oppressed are you really still oppressed? And if that takes you places....then if you are sure you are not oppressed maybe it's time to take a good look around. Maybe you're just keeping the realization out of your head.

I don't think men oppress women. And if I'm right then it follows there is something larger that does it. And, if there is..... then it seems to follow that it may be oppressing men too. It's worth searching out. Check the classifieds.

Draft Counselor's Corner

Courage Needed To Fight Draft

By GILBERT J. SALK

As a draft counselor, I'm constantly confronted by young men who are trying to find an easy way out of the draft. Ways exist, but there is a real moral hassle caused by using that approach to help people "solve" their draft problems.

I am totally opposed to the military and every other system which uses violence. As a direct corallary to this, I am also irrevocably opposed to the draft. This is in part because the draft provides cannon fodder (my brothers) to the military. More importantly, it does a constant, more subtle violence to nearly everyone of draft age. It forces people to lie to and about themselves. It destroys their freedom of choice by setting up an option which is undesirable to most and intolerable to many. Thus, it channels people into courses they might not even consider otherwise.

So what is the problem? Simply that I don't want to continue helping the draft teach people not to confront themselves. This means that I rebel against helping people find an easy out. Instead, I prefer to help them find their way through the system in a way which preserves their personal integrity.

This means work. It's more work for me, and it's more work for the individual involved. But the real point that makes the extra work worth-while is political. As people come directly to grips with the systematic machinations which are working them over, they understand first the ones they are confronting, and, though them, many of the others which are controlling their lives. They also learn that the system can be beaten in a direct confrontation.

Thus, they learn more about themselves as individuals and more about the system as an oppressor. Each individual who finds the courage and the energy to confront the draft as an oppressive system weakens that system's ability to oppress others. Each individual who works through the hassles of applying for a conscientious objector's status weakens the ability of his board to ignore CO's, legitimizes the CO position for others, and bears personal, solitary witness to our government that war is wrong, and that he will not, under any circumstances, be forced or persuaded to lend support to it. The CO, more than any others, is responding to the plea for individual refusal to participate in war's policy-killings voiced in Buffy Saint-Marie's UNIVERSAL SOLDIER.

People who find an easy out stop allowing themselves to feel the oppressiveness of the draft, and as a result leave their brothers standing alone. If, on the other hand, they confront the system and demand that it deal with them as human beings with individual lives to lead, the battle they face makes them aware that others are in the same boat and need the same help that they received.

Basically, I want to see myself out of a job as soon as possible. I am not concerned particularly with getting you out of the draft for the sake of getting you out of the draft I am concerned with helping you free yourself from the draft so that you can begin to confront other systems with your humanity. I am concerned with helping you free yourself from the draft so that you can help others free themselves, so you can help end the war, and so you can help abolish the army.

That's my basic concern as a human being, and my bias as a draft counselor. Your responses to this, and your problems as registrants in the Selective Service System also concern me. I'd like to know what you think.

Stop into the Draft Counseling Services office in 923 Campus Center and talk about how you can take control of your own life.

PEACE

Save Time, Vote Here

Many towns in Massachusetts will be holding their own elections within the next two months. For students who are already registered it is not necessary to take the long trek home on election day to vote. Neither is it necessary to forego your right to cast a ballot. Absentee ballots for both town elections and the up-coming Presidential primary in April are easily obtainable.

In order to get your ballot, address a postcard or letter several weeks in advance of the election to the town clerk or townhall in the city in which you are registered. State that you would like an absentee ballot sent to your present address. Be sure to include your signature in the request, for this must be matched with the signature made at the time of registration.

Upon receiving your ballot, locate a notary public. There are thirteen of these in Whitmore and others are listed in the yellow pages of the telephone directory. Take your unmarked ballot to this man and he will verify, by means of a stamp, that it is actually you that is filling in the ballot. After completion the ballot should be mailed back to your townhall.

In the Presidential primary you must request either a Democratic or Republican ballot. Students registered as independents may request the ballot of either party, however you will then be recorded as registered with that party. You can regain your independent status after the election by simply notifying the town clerk of this desire.

The fight for the 18-20 year old vote was a hard won battle. Do not neglect this opportunity to record your political sentiments merely because of distance.

Health Fees Posted

WASHINGTON (AP)-The Nixon administration Thursday proposed health insurance regulations that would require doctors, hospitals and nursing homes to maintain fee schedules for public inspection.

The proposal was continued in a package of amendments sent to Congress that were designed to tie-in with President Nixon's health insurance legislation.

The American Medical Association earlier announced it would oppose the fee-posting plan.

Other provisions would require states to regulate health insurance companies, protect consumers against failing carriers and force insurers to disclose the percentage of premiums allocated for claims.

Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Elliot L. Richardson cancelled without explanation a mid-morning news conference to announce the proposals. Two assistant secretaries, Stephen Kurzman and Laurence Lynn, were assigned the task in the afternoon.

The powerful American Medical Association served advance notice it would fight the fee posting plan. The AMA, with 205,000 members, contends a similar requirement under the President's wage-price controls will have no effect on health care costs which last year rose at a rate nearly double the cost of living increase.

Few if any patients have asked to see a physician's fee schedule although notices of availability are posted in waiting rooms, an AMA spokesman said.

The administration amendments would require annual independent audits of health insurance carriers and self-insured employers, not required now in any state.

Scarfs Cause Death

BOSTON (AP)-Those long, flowing winter scarfs may be fashionable, but they can also be dangerous, says a Boston plastic surgeon.

Dr. George H. Gifford Jr., of the Children's Hospital Medical Center, says the long, brightly colored scarfs popularized for winter fashion can be a serious health hazard if caught in machinery. Strangulation or broken bones could result.

In an article appearing in the current issue of Pediatrics, Dr. Gifford urges the fashion industry to give greater consideration to the safety aspects of the styles it pushes.

Dr. Gifford illustrates his concern in describing the serious injuries to one of his patients, a 12-year-old Massachusetts girl. The patient received extensive facial cuts and fractures when a long scarf she was wearing on a ski slope became entangled in the machinery of a ski tow and pulled her into it.

Dr. Gifford says he has repaired most of the girl's facial bones and that she is recovering. But he says that the accident shouldn't have happened.

A similar incident occurred several weeks ago in Maine when a young girl was killed when a similar scarf became entangled in the mechanism of a snowmobile on which she was riding.

"It's the same type of danger that is associated with long hair and neckties around machinery," Dr. Gifford says.

He says the "free-flowing scarf" was popularized in the Fall of 1970 by at least one national fashion magazine and several teenage magazines.

"It is a revival of fashion from the early twenties which also claimed its victims," he says in the article. This was recently dramatized in a motion picture about dancer Isadora Duncan, in which she died with her long scarf caught in the wheel of a speeding sports car.

"The public is becoming more aware of hazardous products," Dr. Gifford says, "and I think the medical profession has an obligation to point these things out."

Dr. Gifford notes that public pressure has caused industry to discontinue or modify hazardous toys, electrical appliances and machines.

"The fashion industry should also respond to this type of enlightened persuasion," he says.

Prisoner Breaks Into Sheriff's House

CAMBRIDGE, MASS. (AP)-An inmate has pleaded guilty to a charge of breaking into an unusual residence-that of the Middlesex County sheriff-and stealing 30 quarts of liquor.

Peter F. Kelley, 30, of Wellesley, pleaded guilty in Superior Court Wednesday to breaking into the residence of Sheriff John J. Buckley on the grounds of the House of Correction in Billerica last June.

Kelley's lawyer said the bottles were buried and "nipped at whenever desirable."

Kelley also pleaded guilty to escaping from the Billerica institution Aug. 6, 1971.

He was sentenced to suspended terms of three to five years in state prison on each charge and placed on probation for three years.

Marxism Lecture

"Marxism and Class Struggle in Italy (1961 to the Present)" will be the topic of a lecture at Amherst College by Clark University sociologist Mario Montano.

Appearing under the sponsorship of the Department of Anthropology and Sociology, Professor Montano will deliver the lecture on Wednesday, February 16, at 8 p.m. in the Converse Assembly Room.

He will present the historical background to the contemporary situation in Italy.

Life Concert Tonight

It will still be possible to be admitted at the door to the Life Concert in support of the New England Center for Personal and Organizational Development at the Mark's Meadow Gym of the School of Education this weekend. The experience begins at 7 p.m. tonight and will continue all day Saturday and Sunday until 4 p.m.

Terry Mollner, a doctoral student at the School of Education, designed the experience and sees it "as a combination of the best in rock concerts and the new humanistic methods in psychology."

"Rock concerts," Mollner says, "bring many different kinds of people close together for an extended period of time to share what they do, are, and have with each other. The humanistic psychology movement brings people together to help each other get their head and gut together. A Life Concert does both."

The unique aspect of it is the absence of a leader. Already fifty people have registered to attend and no one is scheduled to suggest anything for them to do. Instead all are agreeing to remain with the community for the weekend and take full responsibility for themselves. One person's reason for attending may be very different from another's. But it is assumed that all will come to discover more about themselves, life, and community living and to enjoy people on a deeper level than one might normally allow himself.

Tickets will be $10 ($5 for students) which will be donated to the New England Center, a non-profit educational organization, making humanistic psychology services available to the university community.

Chisholm In Primary

(Cambridge, Mass.)---- Cambridge City Councillor Saundra Graham, chairwoman of the Massachusetts Committee for Shirley Chisholm for President, announced today that delegates pledged to Shirley Chisholm will appear on the Massachusetts Presidential Preferential Primary ballot on April 25.

"Until three weeks ago, Representative Chisholm had no campaign in Massachusetts," said Councillor Graham. "The beginnings of her rapidly growing grassroots campaign catapulted her into second place at the Mass Caucus in Worcester, January 15. Public response demanded that delegates committed to her candidacy run in April."

Complete slates of delegates have been filed for the 4th and 9th Congressional Districts, said Ms. Graham.

Blizzard Hits Iran

TEHRAN, Iran (AP)-Thousands of Iranian villagers were unaccounted for Thursday after a week-long blizzard that dumped 10 to 26 feet of snow in outlying areas after four years of drought.

Newspapers put the figure of missing persons at 6,000.

Among them is a U.S. female college student and two male companions who went mountain climbing near Tehran on Monday.

A five-man mountain team that set out to search for them Tuesday also has vanished. Officials said the mountain is covered with 39 inches of snow.

Neither the U.S. Embassy nor Aryamehr University in Tehran would identify the American student.

The storm laid a deep blanket of snow across northwestern, central and southern Iran. The government began taking precautions for possible heavy flooding that could come with a thaw.

In Southern Iran, at least 4,000 villagers from the Ardekan area are reported trapped or buried beneath 26 feet of snow.

According to the newspaper Ettelaat, the villages of Kakkan and Kumar near Ardekan are among those buried, and searchers have not found any signs of their inhabitants.

The paper said the region is cut off completely as far as road, cable and telephone communications are concerned.

Premier Amir Abbas Hoveida, coordinating searchers from his downtown office, appealed to civil and military authorities in the stricken northwestern regions to do all they can to rescue the thousands of people trapped and buried by the snow.

The first day of sunshine in a week gave search teams the opportunity to reach some of the trapped trains, snowbound motor vehicles and buried villages.

One team reached the tiny village of Sheklab near the Turkish border and saw no sign of its 100 inhabitants. The team found 18 bodies buried in the snow. The village is at the foot of the rugged Zagrus Mountain range.

Temperature dipped to 13 degrees below zero in Hamadan and Meshab, freezing water pipes and causing a water shortage.

The flu is reported spreading in snowbound villages. Five members of one family in Pirmeloh village near Assdabad, south of Tehran, are reported dead of the flu and nearly all other villagers are said to be down with it.

Helicopters sent to the Koheen Pass, 175 miles northwest of Tehran, to the rescue the occupants of several trapped cars returned to the capital after failing to reach the area due to low clouds and frost.

One survivor who was rescued said that five persons trapped in a car for five days in the pass had frozen to death.

When trolls were around and working they built this strange device on the shores of Lake Winnebobo. For years men have studied it and tried to understand its meaning. They still can't figure it out. (Photo by Al Chapman, MDC Troll Studies Bureau).

by SYDNEY OMARR

Leo travels first-cell and stays in "best" hotels. Gemini can adapt to varying conditions, the important fact being the travel itself. Virgo keeps a travel diary, and Sagittarius can be pedantic in explaing points of interest. Taurus may prefer not to travel in first place, while Pisces prefers out-of-way or offbeat places. Capricorn gets around, often working within a close budget. Aries can become "addicted" to travel and Cancer prefers hom comforts no matter where the destination.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You get plenty of backing. Some key emblitions can be fulfilled. Accept added responsibility; doing so can lead to significant gain. You now earn respect of peers. One in authority rewards with promotion.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You find established pattern changing; you respond to long-distance messaga. Take nothing for granted. Guarantee reservations. Depending on others now would be error. Know this and act accordingly.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Finances effecting mate, partner are emphasized. Joint effort now required to achieve goal. Don't try going it alone. Protect assets. Capricorm individual figures prominently. Investments need review.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Finish rather than initiate projects. Find ways of getting message across to more people. Get expert legal counsel if required. Don't send boy to do man's job. Good publicity available if you plan accordingly.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You recover from emotional setback. Sense of humor enables you to laugh at own foibles. Join forces with Cancer person. Avoid making excessive claims. Set example for those who depend on you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Good lunar aspect now coincides with efforts of heart. Emotions dominate. Check medical, dental appointments. Taking care of yourself is more important than usual. Maintain steady pace. Love situation will improva.

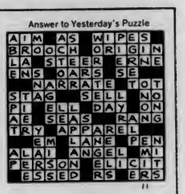
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Check options. Overcome temptation to live in past. Shake off tendency to be lethargic. Sagitterius individual could play important role. Accent is on home, domestic environment. You settle vital issue.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You may feel you are being pulled in two directions simultaneously. Break through red tape. What appears opposition actually is weak. Know this and proceed with confidence. Relative will aid.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 22): Collect needed material. Guerd veluables. One who sweet talks may have ulterior motive. Don't give up something for nothing. B a ready for change of scenery. Pay and receive; take inventory.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Lunar cycle at peak; you gain added incentive. More persons express appreciation for your efforts. Make new starts in new directions. Perfect techniques. Cooperation gained from organization, institution.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Obtain hint from Capricorn message. You do best now by maintaining low profile. Means work quietly, behind scenes. Be discreet. Keep confidential matters confidential. Let others show their hands.



PSICES (Feb. 19-March 20): Occupational income is spotlighted. Your efforts succeed. Bypass those who are petty. There is room for you at top. Know this and act like you know it. Utilize past experience. Dont' be discouraged by one of little faith.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are intuitive, a natural teacher, able to surpass obstacles and perform superbly in times of emergency. You are a progressive, inventive person. If single, marriage is on horizon. March and December are key months.

Commentary-Wrestling

By JIM GOLDMAN

"UMass has been responsible for the entire movement toward better caliber wrestling teams in New England," Head Coach Homer Barr stated recently. When Coach Barr came to UMass in 1967, only two teams, Springfield and Wesleyan were "feverishly recruiting" boys for their squads. University of Massachusetts, defending New England wrestling champs, recruiting wrestlers within a three to four hundred mile radius, concentrating out-of-state in such areas as Syracuse, Albany, Long Island, and eastern Pennsylvania.

For the first time, however, we are getting the most help from Massachusetts boys," which speaks rather well for the Bay State's high school wrestling program, Barr continued.

Among the freshmen wrestlers of whom Coach Barr is justifiably proud is Joe Mulvihill of Melrose who joined the team second semester and in Coach Barr's words, has been doing a "tremendous job." Russ Chateauneuf, a product of Lowell High School and New England Schoolboy Champ at 134 lbs., has a current record of 4-1-3 here at UMass. Mike McGlaughlin, 134 lbs. from Pennsylvania, has shown great promise for the future in his past varsity appearances for the Redmen. Barr attributes, "a great deal of raw talent," to former Springfield Classical great Steve Rome. John Connolly, a graduate of Westford Academy, has been doing "a great job for us" wrestling varsity at 190, although he could go much lower in weight. Dick Muri and Wayne Turnburg, both 134 lbs. and both from Ashland, are doing fine and show plenty of promise.

Indeed, with this fine nucleus of freshmen, many already with varsity experience, Coach Barr should have quite a wrestling tradition in the making for UMass.

As wrestling is growing here at UMass, it is likewise growing at a tremendous rate throughout the rivalry-ridden Yankee Conference.

In Barr's words: "The Yankee Conference is developing into a nice wrestling conference. U.R.I. has come up tremendously. Boston University is currently undefeated and has been doing a good deal of recruiting. UConn and U. Maine are also coming along well and U.N.H. usually comes up with a couple of tough kids." It's little wonder that the Redmen Grapplers are looking anxiously forward to the first Yankee Conference Wrestling Tournament to be held next season on February 10 at Maine.

The wrestling squads of the universities in the Yankee Conference will be where to turn for all the wrestling action in the future as most of the smaller colleges, such as Wesleyan, Amherst and Williams, find they can't keep pace with UMass and the like.

Wrestling is rather a unique sport that in no matter what the size or weight or height of a boy, there's a place for him in wrestling. A wrestling match is a true contest of an athlete's ability and the excitement a match generates is really something to behold. There's always action and surprises in the world of wrestling and one couldn't ask for a better example than our own New England Champion Redmen Wrestlers.

As of February 3, the New England Intercollegiate Wrestling Assoc. Top ten teams are:

1. UMass
2. Springfield
3. B.U.
4. U.R.I.
5. Dartmouth
6. Central Conn. State
7. M.I.T.
8. Bowdoin
9. U.N.H.
10. U.Conn.

Olympic Roundup

The United States now has two gold medals and two bronze. The Soviet Union has four golds, four silvers and three bronze for a total of 11 while East Germany has the largest cache with four golds, three silver and five bronze for 12.

Medal hopes of Americans are virtually non-existent in the other events.

Outside of Miss Henning's brilliant speed skating performance-two Olympic record-breaking sprints around the glassy oval-U.S. athletes had anothe bleak day Thursday on the snowy hillsides and ice tracks of Sapporo.

Paal Tyldum, a 30-year-old Norwegian farmer, won the 50-kilmeter cross country ski race in 2 hours, 43 minutes, 14.75 seconds, while the best American finish was 24th by Gene Morgan of Anchorage, Alaska, in 2:54:01.52.

The men's giant slalom went to a slender Italian, Gustavo Thoeni, the World Cup champion, who completed his two runs down Mt. Teine's 1,130 meters in 3:09.62. The best American placing was 17th by Bob Cochran of Richmond, Vt., in 3:15.54.

The U.S. team of Jack Elder, Castro Valley, Calif., and Frank Jones, Framingham, Mass., finished 15th in the 20 team field. Bob Berkley, Jr., Grand Junction, Colo., and Dick Cavanaugh, Denver, were 17th.

In ice hockey, the United States kept its chances for a bronze medal alive by beating Finland 4-1, its second victory against two defeats. The once-tied Soviet Union crushed Poland 9-3 and remained in first place in the round robin Class A tournament, one point ahead of Czechoslovakia, which edged Sweden 2-1.

Gymnasts Fall To Springfield

By MICHAEL CUSACK

Last Wednesday night saw the UMass varsity gymnasts travel to the Field House at Springfield College in an effort to topple the favored Springfield squad, the current New England Champions. Both teams put on very strong performances, but Springfield's was a bit stronger, as they outscored the Redmen, 156-155. Although the Redmen have lost this year's dual meet with the Chiefs, there are several bright spots to be considered.

Prior to the meet, UMass' best score was a 152.5 output earlier this year in a home meet against Penn State. Before the Springfield meet, totaling the scores for each man's best routine of the year gave a 153.5 team score. Springfield was in an identical position, as their best routines also totalled to 153.5. Not only did the Redmen surpass their best predictable score, but they did it under tremendous pressure during an away meet. Prior to this meet, the UMass squad did not have a reputation as a clutch performance team. Hopefully, the Springfield meet marks the beginning of a Redman squad that will be able to come though while under pressure.

Outstanding performer for UMass was Steve Scuderi. Scuderi, who was out a year with a back injury led the UMass team with an all-around total of 49.00, which was good for second place in the all-around competition. In addition, he won the horizontal bar with a 9.15 routine. All-around Rich Sekunas is improving all the time for the Redmen, as his total of 47.50 shows. Seikunas come through with an 8.3 on pommel horse to lead the Redmen in that event. The third UMass all-around, co-capt. Tony Vacca totalled 47.65, third highest total in the all-around event. Vacca, despite being hampered by a painful shoulder injury, had strong performances in the floor exercise, vaulting, and horizontal bar events.

The Redmen also had a number of fine individual routines from their specialists. As usual, John Calabria was top man for UMass on floor with a routine of 8.7, which earned him a tie for second. Juniors Jay Aronstein and John Oliver continued to lead UMass on rings with respective scores of 9.2 and 8.8. The Redmen's Jay Thomsen easily won the vaulting event, again, with a score of 9.25. Moving to parallel bars saw the Redmen take another first behind the routine of co-capt. Dave Genest, who had an 8.95 score. The final event, high bar, saw the UMass team outscore Springfield, and take the top two places in doing so. Right behind Scuderi was Tom Mysliciki, who turned in a solid routine for a 9.0 score.

Despite losing, this meet was the best of the yar for the UMass team. Instead of choking when the pressure was on, the squad turned in their best performances, which is a good sign, regardless of the outcome.

The Redmen will meet the Chiefs again this year, both at the E.I.G.L. and New England Gymnastic Championships. If the squad continues to compete along the lines of their last effort, they will beat the Chiefs in one, if not both of their next encounters.

The next competition for the Redmen will be Sat., Feb. 12 at 2 p.m., when they travel to Syracuse to take on the Orange squad. This meet should prove to be no problem for the Redmen, who will be looking to up their record to 5-2.

Syracuse always has some outstanding individual performances, but they lack the depth to overtake the UMass squad. Barring any unforeseen disasters, the Redmen should return to Amherst with a 5-2 record to meet Navy on Sat., Feb. 19.

This Saturday's varsity hockey game is at 8:00 P.M. in Orr rink on the campus of Amherst College. It is not at 2:00 P.M. as it is listed in the schedule. Please note that because of a recent ruling the capacity of the rink is 1200 and admission will be terminated when the turnstile count reaches that number. Your cooperation would be appreciated by Amherst College.

Girl Swimmers Face Vermont

By JANIS AHMADJIAN

Friday night starts the big weekend of the semester, Winter Carni here at UMass. It is also the night of the first home meet for the UMass Women's Swim Team when they face University of Vermont at 7:30 WoPE pool.

Vermont boasts a strong experienced team which placed 4th in the New England's this January, a real challenge to the young UMass team.

Freshman Laurie Seluk will be aiming for times to qualify her for the Eastern Collegiate Championship. The events she'll be working on are the 50 yard Butterfly, 100 yard Individual Medley, 50 yard Freestyle, and the 50 yard Backstroke.

This meet will also mark the debut of junior Sue White in the Diving Competition.

The team has been hard at practice all semester and they're aiming for a win on home territory tonight.

Grapplers In Quad

By JOHN BOCK

It is a well-known fact that the University of Massachusetts is the top contender for almost any conference title. Then it may come as a surprise that the UMass wrestling team, currently ranked number one in the New England Intercollegiate Wrestling Association poll, is NOT in contention for the Yankee Conference Wrestling Title. Why? Because there isn't a Yankee Conference Wrestling Title.

The Redmen do travel to Storrs, Conn., this Saturday to attempt to win something similar, a quadrangular involving UConn, URI, and UMaine. It is a fairly common practice in wrestling circles to assemble three teams for a day of wrestling, but is less common to have four. Three matches in less than eight hours are a lot for any man, but things like this are done to show teams their general condition.

In the past, UMass has participated in quads with such national wrestling powers as Ohio University, Bloomsburg State, and Indiana State and they have been respectable.

This is somewhat of a first, though, for the four teams that are rivals to get together and wrestle off with no win loss records to worry about, no Beanpots to think on and no speculation as to who will be upset. If anything it is probably a better preparation for the New Englands coming up on Feb. 25 and 26 at Central Connecticut State College.

Three of the teams are ranked in the top ten in the NEIWA: UMass on top, Rhode Island coming in with a tough third, and UConn in tenth place.

Individually, however, there is a world of difference in performance. Reaching back into the depths of the first semester, one might recall UMass over UConn in the first match of the season at Yale.

The only changes in the UConn lineup come at the upper weights. Randy Hooks, UConn's star heavyweight has quit the team. Hooks had been the Huskies ace in the hole ever since he won the New Englands two years ago. Without him, they are certainly weaker.

URI, though, is something else indeed. Last year the Redmen needed a win in the 190 pound class to beat the Rams and when Ed Carlson provided it Coach Barr breathed a lot easier.

When queried about this URI team, the Coach let a trace of anxiety creep into his normally confident reply. "URI will be a REALLY tight match, another Springfield match right down to the wire."

What does Rhode Island have that could cause such consternation? They have Catania the one man to tie Captain Shelley Goldberg last year and the New England runner-up at 142. Adam at 118 is no pushover and Dave Amato will have a tough time of it. A really strong freshman at 177, Horowitz, has been the only other man to upset Dartmouth's NEIWA Champ Ted Thompson. At Heavyweight the Rams sport McKenna. He was only beaten once last year in the New Englands and that was by Carl Dambman.

How the team is feeling is best seen in their own comments.

"I've got a really tough match and I can't wrestle like I have been lately," said Dave Amato.

"I shouldn't have tied that kid, no way. I beat him in high school and I just should have won. I will this time," this from Shelley.

"You bring him on and I'll wrestle him," stated Clay Jester, UMass 142 pounder.

"I guess I feel good at Heavy, but I'll wrestle wherever I can do the best for the team and that is for URI, the New Englands or whatever," reiterated Carl Dambman.

Wrestling is an intense, grueling individual sport as is obvious by the grimace on the face of Clay Jester's opponent (top) and by the look of cool determination a on Carl Dambman's face (bottom) as he tries to force his opponent to a pin position. The UMass grapplers are NE's best. (Photos by Carl Nash)

WMUA: Saturday night--7:50 airtime--Ken Best and Marty Kelley will bring you basketball action live from Storrs, Connecticut. Then on Sunday night, the same duo will co-host the weekly Sports Talk program. Guests will be Fan Gaudette and Tom Gillams of the freshman hoop team.

Redmen Seek To End Skid

By EARLE BARROLL

So what, you lose a big one...the next day and nobody remembers. Yaaaah!!! Well, that's at least what Muhammad Ali said right after his fight with Joe Frazier.

But for Jack Leaman this season has had too many of the big losses and too many pent up feelings of what's going wrong and the topper was Wednesday night when Boston College held the Redmen off in the last seven seconds for a 75-74 win.

It was another in a series of inconsistent performances by some, big performances by others and thepwkkk of a reputable job at center...The team is fighting these ills.

Tomorrow night, UConn can be the cure-all or the aggravation of this dozen game disease (5-7) as the Redmen begin their big grind into the wars of the Yankee Conference in search of a repeat of last year's title.

Leaman describes the problem as he sees it like this; "too many guys didn't play basketball against Boston College and you can't expect to play B.C. five against four and win.

"We're not getting enough consistent performances to be a good basketball team, especially at center which is becoming a real problem for us. And until we can find someone to do the job for us we're going to struggle."

Just check these stats out: 38 minutes of playing time at center against B.C....five points...eight rebounds, eight personal fouls, eight turnovers and only one field goal. This is definitely a problem.

UConn will pose the same problems for the Redmen as did B.C. The Huskies have good size, they play a tough zone defense, the forwards are exceptionally good in Al Chapman and Garv Custick and Al Vaughn at guard will also pose a big problem.

To stop the Huskies, "We'll have to fast break to neutralize Chapman and Vaughn," Leaman says.

Undefeated with four wins in the conference...this is UMass. With a loss is Rhode Island, a team that has the potential to erupt like Vesuvius. Basketball people have been waiting for this all season.

This has added quite a bit to the importance of this game. "It holds the key to this season," Leaman emphasized. "We have to keep winning until we play Rhody. We're one up on them right now, but if we slip along the way we'll be in for a struggle the remainder of the season."

JV Icemen Win

By TOM PLANT

The UMass J.V. hockey team played Mount Hermon Prep School Tuesday night and nearly forgot they were playing hockey. They remembered in time, however, and solidly trounced their opponents, 9-3.

Coach Russ Kidd played only his freshmen this game, with the exception of a sophomore John Binkoski, who minded the nets in the third period, and the Frosh got quite a battle from a determined Mt. Hermon team for two-thirds of the game, that is.

The game was played with periods shortened to fifteen minutes each, and it took the Redmen about half of the first one to get untracked and get on the scoreboard. Ted Flynn scored the first goal at 7:22 on a screened shot from the face-off circle to the right of the net. Then at 9:35, with a Mt. Hermon player in the penalty box, defenseman Mike Ellis scored the first of his three goals on a slap-shot from the point to put the Redmen ahead 2-0.

The J.V. redmen came out for the second period apparently thinking this game would be a fairly easy victory, and it probably should have been, but the second period was a different game. At 6:07, a Mt. Hermon player stood unguarded for a number of seconds in front of the UMass goal until the puck finally came to him and he easily flipped it past a helpless Steve Moran. Moran was making his first start of the season in goal. Then, at 7:50, on a power-play situation, Mt. Hermon scored again to tie it at 2-2. They seemed to have a small-school desire to defeat a University team; enough desire to put them in the lead three minutes later. It was not an impressive period of hockey for the Redmen. They weren't connecting on passes and they weren't setting up plays.

It was obvious that after the second period the Redmen were worrying, and they began to play good hockey in the final stanza. Mike Ellis tied it up again on his second goal with only 34 seconds gone on the clock, and they proceeded to quickly score three more in the next three minutes. Kevin Connors scored what turned out to be the winning tally at 1:26. Steve Dee made it 5-3 at 2:34 with an assist from Wayne Douglas, and Douglas scored himself at 3:01. Wayne got his second goal at 6:39 when he positioned himself in front of the Mt. Hermon net and stuffed in the rebound of Kevin Connors' shot. With four minutes remaining, Ellis got his "hat-trick" to put UMass ahead by 8-3, and with only a minute left Connors ended the scoring as he took a pass from the corner from Kevin Thompson and slapped it home for the ninth Redmen goal. The UMass J.V.'s were so dominating in the thir period that Mt. Hermon could manage only four shots on goal. The win was the fourth of the season for the J.V.'s against four losses and a tie.

On Saturday the J.V. Redmen will play against Yale at New Haven. In their previous meeting this season, they lost to Yale by a close score of 6-4. However, it was one of their better efforts this year, and they will undoubtedly be more prepared for the rematch.

Runners Face NU

By SANDY LAWN

A myth was exploded recently. The myth was Harvard's invincibility in Boston track-and the myth breaker is UMass' next opponent-the undefeated Huskies of Northeastern. NU, fresh from beating Harvard by 30 points (first loss by Harvard in 4 years) and the Greater Boston League meet is always a New England indoor power, The Huskies, who according to Coach Ken O'Brien have no weak spots, are 3 deep in every event and are especially strong in the middle distance events where they are led by Paul Horrigan in the 600. O'Brien is hoping to offset Horrigan with Steve Crimmin and Steve Levine. Another threat is Larry Joseph in the mile. Joseph just had a 4:10 mile in the GRL meet for second. O'Brien pins his hopes on Rick Barry and a promising pair of freshmen, Bill Gillen and Randy Thomas. Other Husky stars include Ed Shaugnessy in the high jump and Jim Carrisella in the pole vault.

Always optimistic for the win, O'Brien is hoping that UMass can score heavily in their strong events and maybe scrape some points from NU's strong spots. Some of the performers Coach O'Brien is counting on are sprinters Tony Pendleton and Ron Harris. Add to this hurdler Jim Graves and long jumpers Pete Ryan and Mike Gereghty, and you have a good part of UMass' bid for an upset to even their 1-2 record and give them some momentum for the upcoming conference meet. Keep your fingers crossed.

More Than A Private Interest At Stake

By ANNE STADNICKI

Ralph Nader is a man who doesn't take it easy. Characteristically, he fell asleep in the car enroute from Springfield last Monday, in what was possibly one of his few leisure moments that day.

Nader claimed that Americans don't know how to use their leisure time, when he spoke to Western Mass. Public Interest Research Group (WMPIRG) enthusiasts then. He said that Americans waste themselves in front of their television sets when ten to fifteen per cent of their time should be devoted to citizenship.

"Citizenship is a boring word because it isn't given the flesh and blood operation that means something to everyone," Nader said. He explained that individuals have to find a problem of their own choosing to work away their boredom. They can become creative when they find that cirizenship can be that substitute, he believes.

If a problem challenges the individual's mind, and his value system, Nader says it will stimulate as sense of responsibility and self-reliance in the individual. He noted that students especially have a great potential in the wide field of challenges because "...never again will they be as free and flexible as now...without the day to day erosions that cause inefficiency and waste time".

Students should take an idea and pursue it as part of their education, according to Nader. He said that substantive result could come of studies on various problems if students were willing to write for documentation -to get together a body of writing not already in the library. There is a vast resource of information available if only someone would seek it out, Nader said.

The unproductive system which student boredom evidences could be changed as students move to action when they are challenged, according to Nader, or when they vote. He said that students should no longer be treated as children, and the change of status is coming slowly with people of the older age groups accepting the fact that

The Overthrow: Part Three

We had left the Midget behind at "bites and sucks" while we went to infiltrate Bartlett 252. On the way we racked our brains for a devilish scheme to leave that home of Undergraduate English in chaos.

"Nick", I said to my partner, "rack your brain". He racked and I shivered in the cold as we walked ou of the tunnel that was no-man's land between "passion pit" and the civilized world.

Nick's intent face lit up. He had something good. "At home, we have an apple orchard where my old man has to spray the trees with insecticide. He uses a kind of fogging machine to do the job. Why not load the machine up with fog instead of insecticide?"

"A fantastic idea! When can we do it?"

"I can get the thing this weekend and we can be ready to go by next Friday."

But we were forgetting about the most important aspect of our operation–the main attack on the bookstore. We walked on. "What about the bookstore? We still haven't really developed the plans for that expedition."

"Okay. We got the Midget into this because of his invaluable size. After pushing him in through the window on one side of the bookstore he lets us in through one of the back doors."

"The actual hollowing out of the books is going to be quite time consuming unless we figure out some kind of assembly-line method of operating.

"Right after we get through here I'll take to see my man in Havana who will donate the marijuana," said Nick.

"We should check out the stuff before we continue with the plan, free or not. Shity stuff could ruin all our work. Can you imagine the consequences of that kind of mistake!" I started to get worked up. "English 125 students opening up their books, at first being overjoyed at the discovery of their bonus, trying it out and then not even getting a buzz!!! Utter ruin."

"Take it easy, take it easy", Nick comforted. We turned the corner to confront Bartlett Hall face to face; the business at hanc would occupy my mind.

We walked into Bartlett 252 and there she was sitting at her desk. Irma Forader. Lording over the entire Undergraduate English Department. I decided to open the questioning with an innocent one.

"Where can I find Hemling's mailbox", I said.

"Who?" Irma answered.

"Hemling". I said, caught off guard. "He's in the English 125 program."

"I never heard of him," she said shortly.

"Vernon P." I added desperately.

"You mean Helming", she said pronouncing his name Hell-ming while looking down her nose (and that is quite a feat if you consider her nose.) "Down stairs in the English Department Headquarters."

At that moment Jonathan Quick, Chief Advisor in Undergraduate English, stumbled from his office looking quite stoned. When I was at orientation many summers ago I heard tell several interesting anecdotes about this man: "His hero is Jonathan Swift", I was told. "He had his Christian name changed to Jonathan. He looks like a speed freak, doesn't he? We just call him Professor Speed."

I turned from Irma to Quick to ask him the not so innocent question: "Who runs the English 125 program?"

He strained for a couple of seconds with my question. "Dr Brogan is in charge of that program".

"Brogan!" I almost shouted. That man I just cannot get away from. I was starting to work myself up into a frenzy. Nick saw this and quickly pulled me from the office with Irma babbling something (in her almost perfect imitation of an Englis accent) to Quick about Guiliver's Travels. Quick was gazing off into the distance and when she spoke to him he started, looked at her, and raced into his office.

By the time we got outside I had calmed down and was thinking about the latest developments. I was really going to get my revenge now. Howard O. Brogan was to blame for all the shit I was getting buried under courtesy of English 125. When I got through with Brogan he was going to be sorry he ever even heard of English never mind a thing called English 125. With those vengeful thoughts in my head we headed back to Southwest (to find Nick's philanthropistic friend and check out his dope) glancing to one side then the other, then whispering to each other, our heads close together.

The Prisoner Escapes

When Kate Millett tried to bury male literature in Sexual Politics did you stop carrying around copies of D.H. Lawrence for fear of being called a Male Chauvinist Pig? Did you burn all your Henry Miller? Well, you acted prematurely. Norman Mailer, who survived the Millet Bonzai has come back with a potent work called The Prisoner of Sex which not only unearths your favorite authors but indicts their detractor for her unliterary and unsportsmanlike conduct. Or so Frank Baglione tells us in his review of Mailer's book on pages 4 and 5. Are the men forming a new front against women's revolutionary henpecking? Field Marshall Mailer has already called up the troops in Prisoner of Sex.

pages four & five

What Makes Johnny Run?

1972 looks like it may be a pretty staid year as far as National Politics. The battle will come down to Nixon and Muskie, or so it seems as of 1968 when people were saying Johnson would defeat his Republican opponent by a landslide? National Politics, despite what George Gallop might tell you, are completely volatile. Eugene McCarthy proved that four years ago when he came from nowhere and pretty near beat an incumbent President one cold March day in New Hampshire. The situation is ripe again, this time on the Republican side, and our own stringer from National Review Matthew Tackeff explores the situation on pages 8 and 9. Will Ashbrook be the one?

pages eight & nine

The Apotheosis of the Strong-Man

Why is this man's stomach upset? Because he's sick and tired of hot dogs for lunch and dinner (it doesn't really make much difference to Harry). And another thing! He's sick and tired of people calling him "dirty". Well, in our movie pages Jim Lavrakas (who makes the transition from records to movies) gives us the low down on just why this "dirty" man and his anti-matter opposite of "Straw Dogs" attract so much attention and regard. It's a mini-psychoanalysis of your most unspeakable secrets.

For Your Edification and Delight

Lo and Behold, that's not all. Jump to pages 6 and 7 and read part one of Nathaniel Hayden's story of how a comet changed the minute amount of melanin in the cell of the human organism and knocked the Republic off its feet. From that fictional home truth move on to our albums pages where Bill Densmore tells us Paul Simon is just as good without Art Garfunkel, Gary Gomes says Roland Kirk is well worth your while, and Mike Kostek would like you to meet Country Joe McDonald. All on pages 10 and 11. Frank Johnson continues his exploration into the audio world and his concluding section on amplifiers in on page 9. Then Movies, have we ever got movies. Besides Jim Lavrakas' piece on our unnatural desires and cloistered fascinations, there's Bob Nesti's tauting of The Last Picture Show as being the Best American film in quite some time. Not the same can be said about Diamonds Are Forever as James Bond becomes (gasp) a boring, silly man. Mary Lou Gordon tells us all about it on page 14. The Puzzle, this week more of the same, is on page 15 with the answers to last week's. You may never now forget Aldo Ray. Weekend is at the back, and part three of our little crime caper against the powers in Bartlett continues on the left. Erma beware, the worst is yet to come.

Nader– More Than A Private

students have the right to vote.

"The student vote itself is going to be more meaningful as the eighteen to twenty year olds emerge...They will alter part of the political system," Nader said. He mentioned that the student PIRG groups which he is attempting to start among students all over the country have no political alliance, however.

He claimed that "The impact of student PIRG is maximized when it stays out of politics". He underlined the fact that students should force politicians to address the issues, but should not take sides themselves.

"Student PIRGs transcend politics," Nader said.

The student PIRGs are one of Nader's current projects. In addition to applying his techniques to the student-run, student-funded consumer protection organization, he keeps a busy schedule of speaking engagements and sporadically flies to Washington, D.C. for Congressional hearings and to check up on the progress of investigations of government agencies and corporations and law firms.

In 1968 he sent a group of law students to Washington to study the Federal Trade Commission. In 1970 he had two hundred law students looking at "institutions" under his sponsorship.

Nader began in Washington in 1964 as a consultant with several congressional committees. This came about because he specialized in automobile accidents and became the consumer crusader on automobile safety after he graduated from Harvard Law in 1958.

Nader feels that "...a lawyer should serve the public interest". For this reason he developed the Center for the Study of Responsive Law: he wanted to make the running of legal institutions more responsive to the broader public.

"It is not enough to have rights, if there are no representatives to fight for these rights," Nader said in Springfield.

Nader seems to concentrate on identifying the problem areas now, although he does not leave all the work to his research groups. He said that he has pending a specific court test of the Corrupt Practices Act, which calls for a detailed disclosure of campaign funds, but it has never before been enforced.

He is interested in auto safety still, which first made him famous as a "crusader". When asked about his sentiments for the dirty orange Maverick in which he was being chauffeured that day, Nader only remarked that everyone had better fasten their seat belts. And true to form, he carefully strapped the harness across his chest each time he ventured out into traffic, always with a securely locked door as a safeguard.

Nader is a man who doesn't take it easy. He is a man who does his most to provoke people and arouse them to some sense of responsibility as citizens. He says he is a "public interest lawyer" but the hunched shoulders, the haggard eyes and the quick naps on the road say he's more. He's got a private interest at stake, too.

"I dont' want to breathe polluted air or drink polluted water or ride in unsafe automobiles," said Nader. He's counting on it that the public feels the same way.

Correspondences To Poor Richard's

To the Editor:

We want to call your attention to page six of the February 4, 1972 edition of Poor Richard's in which Jim Lavrakas refers to Laura Nyro's backup singers as "three black chicks". Chicks are chickens, Jim, and women are human beings not chickens. Animals themselves deserve more respect.

Refer to someone as less than human and you treat them as less than human; you take away their humanity. It is then easier to kick them or beat them or rape them or even kill them.

We want to recommend that the Collegian refuse any further articles that use language which in any way degrades human beings; specifically words like 'broads, chicks, girls, etc.,' being used to refer to women. 'Woman' is the only acceptable word for a female person not 'girl', not 'dame', not 'bird'...

The Collegian should also use 'Ms' rather than 'Miss' or 'Mrs.' and begin to be aware of how language effects people and their consciousness.

Mary Orovan of the New York Radical Feminists suggests the use of the ancient alternative Indo-European root word "co" to replace the masculine personal pronouns "he" or "his" when we really mean people of both sexes. The old possessive "his" (for his-hers) is repleced by "cos" and "coself" replaces "himself". Humankind replaces mankind.

We believe that language changes make an important difference!

To the Editor:

Bob Nesti's review of Straw Dogs (A Gnawing And Ugly Experience, Poor Richard's February 4, 1972), while it succeeded in describing the foreboding and incredibly depressing atmosphere of that film, falls prey to one of the faults Mr. Nesti describes. Nesti writes "Straw Dogs ultimately falls victim to its hackneyed, simple theme of triumphant masculinity.

Yet in the review Nesti himself falls prey to stock phrases, the simple rhetoric that assumes masculinity is a pejorative term. Thus the rape scene "underscores the rank male supremacist attitude" of the film our reviewer tells us as if his reader will see this and say "Oh, yes those nasty male supremacists".

And again, Nesti refers to the scene where sodomy is performed as the culmination of "masculine sexual fantasy". While obviously scoring points with the women's liberationists this "enlightened" rhetoric adds little to a criticism of the film. It is grossly unfair to men, interprets masculinity as a depraved characteristic, and turns the words "male, "masculine" into obscenities.

In any event when I read a review I do not like to think that my reviewer has become imbued with the rhetoric of T. Grace Atkinson or Bobby Seale. Mr. Nesti's reviews are always good and usually very informative. But when he uses catch phrases and radical chic terms he tells me less about the film and more about hiw own political persuasion.

Why Mr. Nesti succumbed to using such convenient epithets in the place of thoughtful criticism is puzzling since, other than this lapse and the one where he falls back on the term "Fascist" his review is an excellent description of Pekinpah's grotesque and sanguinary film.

Yes, Straw Dogs is a bad film "strident in execution, vacuous in theme", and unnecessarily violent. But I would challenge Mr. Nesti's claim that this represents a "conscious, cold, horrible exaltation of a simplistic masculine ideal".

Pekinpah's sins are his own and they cannot be laid at the feet of masculinity or, for that matter, of Fascism. Both are large terms which resist simple definition.

Mailer: Moving To Establish

BY FRANK BAGLIONE

The Prisoner of Sex by Norman Mailer. (Hardcover) Little, Brown and Company; (Paper) Signet Books. 175 pp.

Like most of Mailer's recent work -- Miami and the Siege of Chicago; King of the Hill; Of a Fire on the Moon -- his Prisoner of Sex is a piece written in response to a specific event. In this case the event was the appearance of Kate Millett's Sexual Politics and other women's liberation tracts that named Mailer as their major ideological foe.

For those of you fortunate enough to have not read Millett's 400 page diatribe against men in general and male writers in particular, it is, in the words of Patricia Coyne of The Alternative magazine, a doctoral thesis which finds a theme, inflates it, twists it, and finally presents it as a universal theme. Millett's Sexual Politics is, in short, literary slander...a cheap and vicious attack on D.H. Lawrence, Henry Miller and Norman Mailer for their views on women (as seen through Millett's feverishly jaudiced eyes).

In Prisoner of Sex, originally published in Harpers magazine, Mailer rises quickly to the challenge. His prose is light and joyful as one who enters the battle with steady confidence. Not only is he a much superior writer than the far too literal Millett, but he is also armed with the ability to do a literary criticism of Lawrence in his short book with greater vision and expertise than Millett could accomplish in her ponderously dull and inaccurate 400 pages.

Mailer sets the stage for his joust with Millett and the women's liberationists by recalling incidents in the past which harbingered his present problems with what some have unkindly called "the butch brigade." He remembers having lunch with Gloria Steinem of New York magazine and refusing her proposal that he run for Mayor of New York. Mailer writes, "...she had smiled and said, 'Well, at least I won't have to explain you to my friends at women's lib.'

" 'What could they have against me?'

"'You might try reading your books some day.'

"(In an interview he had once said, 'Women, at their worst, are low sloppy beasts.') He made reference to this now, and added, 'I thought the next question would be, 'What are women at their best....I would have replied that women at their best are goddesses.'"

Mailer finally did run for mayor, and in this endeavor "ran into the redoubtable Bella Abzug" at a small meeting with some ladies. He writes this humorously apt description--"At the center was Abzug...Bella! the future congresswoman with bosoms which spoke of butter, milk, carnal abundance, and the firepower of hard-prowed gunboats.

" 'Listen,' said Bella, '...we're here to look you over.' She gave him the flat look of a furniture mover. 'Your record against the war in Vietnam is okay, nothing spectacular, but decent. Yet your views on women do not impress us. In fact we think they stink. We thin your views on women are full of shit.' She had a voice which could have boiled the fat off a taxicab driver's neck."

Mailer, who is the Prisoner of the title and writes of himself in the third person throughout the book, also mentions the remark he made on a talk show that "women should be kept in cages."....."He had grinned broadly as he said this, delighted with the gasp which came up from the audience." He was putting them on and was pleased that he had cut such a remark "in the teeth of growing piety over the treatment of women...No man who thought women should be kept in cages would ever dare to declare such a sentiment." His humorless audience could not see his only crime was impiety.

Yet in this age of mushy liberal slobberings impiety is great enough a crime. And Mailer would be punished. His first impression of the attacks made by women's liberation reveal his sense of being wronged. "He did not know why a lack of such literary niceties (in Sexual Politics) as fair quotation and measured attack should bother him more in women. Was it because a male critic who practiced such habits could not go far--the stern code of professionalsim in other men and bound to cut him down." The apologists for liberation movements, however, do not apply stern codes.

Mailer tells how he began reading women's liberation tracts in preparation for the battle with Millett. He read material from NOW (National Organization of Women) on down to the SCUM manifesto (Society for Cutting Up Men). "Some of the women were writing like very tough faggots," Mailer concludes and then like a military man expressing admiration for his foe, "It was a good style."

But how does Mailer feel about women in general. He carries some strong impressions and much of what he says will be rejected as wrong, as "chauvinist," as myth. Yet Mailer can create beautiful images to express these "myths," conjure probing metaphors to mask his "chauvinism," issue compelling symbolism with which to cloth his "error." He places women "a step, or a stage, or a move or a leap nearer the creation of existence, they were-- given man's powerful sense of the present--his indespensible and only connection with the future." Yet her prize was her defect also. "The womb was a damnable disadvantage in the struggle with the men...that spongy pool, that time machine with a curse, dam for an ongoing river of blood whose rhythm seemed to obey some private compact with the moon...Did women get into automobile accidents? More than half their accidents came on a particular week of the month--just before and during menstruation was the time of that week. So, too, were half of the female admissions to mental hospitals in that week, and more than half of their attempted suicides, half the crimes committed by women prisoners." She was "victim of unpleasantness, ordour, stainings which take up anything from a seventh to a fifth of her adult life until the menopause...it is not so unnatural to react with rage against a mystical communion which condemns her to diapers, dishes, and the foul shock of unforgiving cramps, not to mention an unbroken string of defeats in her attempt to take over control of the world from men."

If this were not enough, says Mailer, than there is conception, "for conception was embarkation on a train whose stations were obligation and guilt." But conception would not hold the women's liberationists down..."Shit no," said the ladies, "Suck the fucker out."

Mailer breaks into full stride as he approaches his criticism of Millett's hatchet-job of Henry Miller and D.H. Lawrence. "By and major literary perspective, the land of Millett is a barren and mediocre terrain....a foul and dreary place to cross." At each inn was served "a can of ideological lard," and all the "bloody ground steamed with the limbs of every amputated quote," each corpse (Lawrence, Miller, Mailer) had been "crudely assassinated, then so unceremoniously dumped."

From this ground Mailer launches his attack on Millett's shameless method of misinterpreting and misrepresenting the literature of the authors she dispises. A few examples on Miller will suffice. Millett interprets a passage from Tropic of Capricon --- "As all Americans know, the commercial world is a battlefield. When executives are "fucked" by the company, they can retaliate by "fucking" their secretaries. Miller's is "part-nigger" and "so damned pleased to have you fuck her without blushing"....She commits suicide eventually, but in business, 'it's fuck or be fucked,' Miller observes."

That is Millett interpreting Miller, "except it is not Miller she is quoting," says Mailer, "even if she gives him the words and puts them in quotation marks." The actual passage by Miller reads "we were a merry crew, united in our desire to fuck the company at all costs. And while fucking the company we fucked everything in sight that we could get hold of..." This is a merry observation, says Mailer, not a bitter one. "But Kate's version works more effectively to slip the reader the assumption that Miller is a racist who jeers at his secretary's death...In fact, the suicide isn't even mentioned at that point in Tropic of Capricorn--it's mentioned twenty-eight pages later in an opposite context where Miller,

LIFE CONCERT

Fri., Feb. 11 - Sun., 4 p.m.

Mark Meadow Gym - S. of Ed. - 7 p.m.

You are invited to a Life Concert with the understanding that you will be contracting with everyone else who comes to take full responsibility for yourself from the moment you arrive until you choose to leave. We will not suggest anything for you to do. A Life Concert is moments and space and life apart from our conditioned, interdependent world of survival fears, burdensome responsibilities and goal striving, where one may more easily be at one with himself, others, the world and what's happening. Life Concerts differ according to the contract for living together and self-discovery which all participants make with each other. Last fall we conducted a Life Concert where the contract was to not talk. Nearly a hundred people enthusiastically participated. Remaining with the community without anything planned to do, we found ourselves being what we had been endeavoring to become. We also became aware of assumptions upon which we were operating but of which we had been previously unaware.

discovering that the secretary is about to be fired because one of his superiors doesn't want a Negro in the company, comes to her defense, describes her indeed as 'extremely intelligent and extremely capable.' "

After righting a number of wrongs that Kate has committed against Miller by using chopped up quotations, Mailer turns to her slander of D.H. Lawrence. The following passage is Millett interpreting Lawrence: "You lie there," he orders. She accedes with a "queer obedience"--Lawrence never uses the word female in the novel without prefacing it with the adjectives "weird" or "queer"...Mellors concedes one kiss on the navel and then gets to business: "....The activity of the orgasm was all his, all his; she could strive for herself no more."

Mailer then quotes from the original passage to show what a patch job Millet has done: "You lie there," he said softly, and he shut the door...he touched the warm soft body, and touched her navel for a moment with a kiss. And he had to come into her at once..She lay still, in a kind of sleep, from which she did not begin to rouse till he had finished and lay softly panting against her breast."

After reading this I could not believe that Millett had actually so poisoned the tone of this passage in Lady Chatterley's Lover. I sought the passage myself. Where Lawrence had written "he said softly," Millett had seen "he orders;" Lawrence's "touched her navel for a moment with a kiss" changes to "concedes one kiss on the navel and then gets to business" in the bloodied hands of Kate Millett. And in book after book Mailer shows us how Kate has done the same blatant misinterpretation of Lawrence's passages. Every sweet and tender description is made hard and cruel through the slandering of "good sister Kate." To Millett Lawrence is a "counterrevolutionary sexual politician, but since women love his work she "distorts it by small moves, brief elisions in the quotation," in her desire to steal the verdict.

Mailer's views on Lawrence are much more sane and true. He writes: "Lawrence saw every serious love affair as fundamental do-or-die: he knew he literally died a little more each time he missed transcendence in the act. It was why he saw lust as hopeless. Lust was meaningless fucking."

Mailer closes his book with his personal views and meanderings on sexuality, creatio, etc. Some of it is quite good, other parts bizarre. Yet he strikes home often. Dealing with Millett's use of quotations from Hitler to sound a comparison to the views of Miller, Lawrence and himself, Mailer writes that he had "come to the conclusion a long time ago that all thought must not cease with Adolf Hilter, that if, in the course of living with a thought, it might appear to run parallel for a time to arguments Nazis had also been near, one should not, therefore slam the books, close the inquiry, and cease to think in such direction any further." So he continues with his thoughts against abortion and contraception. He continues to celebrate conception and the "might fuck," and "orgasms like the collision of a truck, or coming soft as snow."

Mailer teases the women's liberationists who say we must be pushed into "that enforced domain of equality where the sexes, she (Millett) would declaim, 'are inherently in everything alike, save reproductive systems, secondary sexual characteristics, orgasmic capacity and genetic and morpholigical structure.' Mailer chides: "Good sister Kate," would reply any lady from centuries before, "reproductive systems are better than half of it!"

Mailer has put much into this book to show that we are all Prisoners of our Sex and that there are emotional, physical, psychological and, at least to Mailer, metaphysical forces that act differently on men and women and that these will ultimately frustrate the great equallizing charge of "the Totalitarian Left."

Whatever the merit of his claims, and certainly there is some merit in them, we can appreciate Mailer in Prisoner of Sex for his engaging prose, his dashing stances and his bold pose. If he is "America's Number one Male Chauvinist Pig" he wears the title proudly and many rally 'round him for his defense of the feelings and dignity of men besieged by the assaults of Millett et al. He has written much that is not great, but he is still, at his best, a great writer. He has failed many times to represent the best of that which is masculine, but he is, at his best, the soul of the proud virile male.

Mailer is, in his new role, the spokesman for what men feel. He is articulate and often eloquent in that role. Millett, of course, sees him differently. She sees "the secret terror of homosexuality; a mixture of sin and fascination and fear which drives Mailer to his heterosexual posturing. To be faggot, damned, leprous--to cease to be virile were either to cease to be--or to become the most grotesque form of feminine inferiority--queer." That, in the jumbled prose of Kate Millett, is how we are to find Mailer.

Mailer is more eloquent in describing the passion for masculinity: "The accusation of homosexuality arouses a major passion in many men; they spend there lives resisting it with a biological force. There is a kind of man who spends every night of his life getting drunk in a bar, he rants, he brawls, he ends in a rumble on the street; women say, 'For God's sake, he's homosexual, Why doesn't he just turn queer and get his suffering over with.' Yet men protect him. It is because he's choosing not to become homosexual. It was best put by Satre, who said that a homosexual is a man who practices homosexuality. A man who does not is not a homosexual--he is entitled to the dignity of his choice."

And that with all the dignity and eloquence of which Mailer is capable is the force behind man's constant aggressiveness; that is why he describes each act of love as a battle with himself--a struggle for potency; why each successful lay is a tremerous victory, an assurance of virility. That is why sexual games are a sport akin to war, the hunt; why women are at one and the same time tender partners in love and the enemy to be taken down, conquered, made to submit.

Kate Millett

Men are, at their worst, "low sloppy beasts," but like the female, at their best they are gods. As such they are entitled to that power, to that worship, to that respect by others and of themselves which they can command. What Mailer says loudest and clearest in his book is that we must not blur all distinctions, that we must not demean the creation in the womb or the power in the phallus, that we must not rob one another of the illusions in our dreams. It is to each woman to make her man the god he plays, and to each man to make his woman the goddess to which she aspires. Dignity comes not from equality, but from love.

Mailer's writing, suffering of late from his political flirtations, is much improved in this book. Demolishing Millett's thesis was, of course, no giant's task. Yet the ease with which he did the job shows what insights are returning to him, what sharp phrases and soft descriptions are beginning to flow. In Prisoner of Sex we receive the steady assurance that we shall not be abandoned to the legalistic prose of courtroom dramatics, that metaphor will not be driven from the field by harsh rhetoric, and that the shield and sword shall not be beaten into the picket sign and peace symbol.

"The women have breached an enormous hole in the line, and the question is only how far back the men (moving silently in retreat) must go before they are ready to establish a front."

We've Been Through Some Changes:

By NATHANIEL W. HAYDEN

"...And now the news with Morris Maxwell."

"Good evening. Tonight we will have a special report with Herbert Feinberg, an astronomer who has been studying the velocity and direction of the strange comet that was spotted near Venus a few days ago. We will begin the discussion with Mr. Feinberg after this word from Prudential Insurance.

"...Mr. Feinberg, is there a real possibility that the comet you sighted last week near Venus will endanger Earth?"

"No, I don't believe it will cause any damage. I estimate that it will either pass over the United States and Canada or will plunge into the Atlantic. the troubling thing is that we have no idea where this thing is coming from."

"Why is that especially troubling?"

"Well, we can't make any guesses about its composition. We have no idea what effect it will have on people or things if it passes directly over us."

"Yes, but if everyone is underground when and if that happens, will that be a

"...What about crops, wildlife etcetera? Don't you think they should be of primary concern too? "

"I see your point... What does the man and woman on the street think of the comet? We sent Ray Vann out to investigate."

"Miss, what do you think the comet sighted a while ago will do? Do you think it'll effect us in any way?"

"Oh gosh, I really couldn't say.I have no idea."

"Are you scared?"

"Sure. I really don't know what to expect."

"How about you sir, would you like to guess what'll happen with that comet?"

"I don't think nothin' will happen."

"And you sir?"

"I don't care. I've got more important things to worry about."

"Is there anything more important than life? What do you think are the chances of the comet plunging to Earth?"

"Look I've got things to do. You mind?"

"It appears that the consensus is that the comet is nothing to worry about. Now, if we can just get scientists to believe that. This is Ray Vann reporting from Appathi Center."

"There were third degree race riots in three cities today and a couple of first degree riots in two others. Black teenagers went on a window breaking spree in Los Angeles, Little Rock and St. Louis today causing approximately 'our million dollars in property damage.' Police reported that the cause of the outbreaks were due to the lack of summer jobs in those cities. The story was a bit different in Saint Albans on Long Island. Portions of one of Queens County's main shopping areas, Jamaica Avenue, were gutted by arsonists to protest the decision made by the Highway Authority to extend the Clearview Expressway down the middle of Saunt Albans, wiping out thousands of homes owned by lower middle income blacks. One unidentified arsonist said," My wife and I worked for twenty years to buy our house here for $20,000. The Highway Authority says they'll give us only 15,000 for it. I'll be damned if I'll allow that. Even if they gave us $20,000 it would be difficult to find another house near here in the same price range. Just to let everybody know what's been happening and how we feel, we burned down a little part of the avenue."

"Since when sir is a three mile strip of stores and the like a little part of any avenue? Besides, Jamaica Avenue is two miles from your home what did you expect to gain by burning the avenue down?"

"You suggesting I should have burned down my home instead? If anybody tries to take my house from me they're going to get burned just like we burned the avenue."

"Similar actions were taken in New Haven, when Yale made public its intention of expanding into New Haven's black ghetto. It appears that we are faced with a new, more highly organized and effective mode of rioting. Only time will tell whether or not there will be more serious actions like thuse before repressive action is taken...

"And that's the news this evening, July 3rd, 1976."

"How was it today?"

"Eh, it was all right. Yours?"

"The kids were smoking marijuana in their rooms again."

"So what else is new?"

"What are we going to do about that?"

"What right do we have to tell them they shouldn't smoke the stuff? You know what they'll say, "Alcohol is a drug too dad."

"Well, I know what I'm doing to do. The next time I catch them I'm going to call the police."

"Doris, you've got to be joking. You would turn in your own kids?"

"Come off it. You know what I mean."

"I think it's going to be great. Especially since we know that that damned comet will just pass over us instead of smashing into anything...Speaking of smashing, Marcia Knopf smashed into Diane Fuller's beautiful rose garden and you should have seen the look on Marcia's face when Diane ran out of her house and said, "you clumsy bitch, why don't you watch..."

URGENT

WASHINGTON Comet

Take 1:

It was reported today that large numbers of people went to hospitals and doctors offices today in a state of what was initially considered hysteria. For some un-- explained reason, all of these people, who were apparently Caucasians claimed that they were actually black or considered black this morning.

Hundreds were taken to mental institutions for they ran into the streets screaming, "I'm a ghost, I'M a ghost. Why now? I'm only in my thirties" or something comparible to "I've got the White Plague. Help me [illegible] the White Plague."

The news came over the wire, quite innocuously, and read like this.

"It's illegal and God knows what it does to them." —

"Why don't we talk about you for a minute. Do you realize what liquor does to you? You get bombed out of your mind. Kids who smoke pot are at least able to maintain some sense of reality. And they don't have to worry about having hangovers either."

"Enough. If I catch them smoking that garbage one more time, out they go. Morris, I just will not condone it."

"If you do what you said you'd do while I'm around you better be ready for a trip to Vegas to get a divorce...What are you crying about?"

"I don't...know. I'm just wonder you're so angry tonight. You know I could never have our sons arrested. And yet you didn't bother to find out why I said that I would. Why aren't you paying attention to me?"

"Did you ever think that I might have something on my mind?"

"What is it?"

"I guess it isn't much really. I was just thinking about the riots that have taken place recently. We're all doing everything we can to help Negroes achieve equality yet they've become more and more destructive. Now they're burning down large department stores and banks instead of their tenements. And these aren't only the poor uneducated ones. They've got some middle class ones helping them now. I'm wondering if our efforts to help them are worth it any more."

"You know the old saying, if you give them an inch, they'll take a mile. I never believed that before, but I certainly think it's apropos now."

"That's a crude way of looking at the situation."

"But probably accurate."

"What do you think of the bicentennial ceremonies being planned?"

"Anything to change the subject ha? I have nothing against the planning of bicentennial ceremonies."

"Yeah. Where's Ray Vann? If he's white I'll believe anything."

"Who the hell do you think I am?"

"I thought you were Dave Eisen?"

"Take another look."

"Oh shit."

"That's exactly what I said when I got up and took a look in the mirror this morning. When my wife woke up and saw me standing in the bathroom she started screaming:

"I don't know how you got in here, cracker, but you better move your ass out, fast before you get this in your belly." She had my gun! I stood there begging for her to just take a look at her hands and see that I wasn't lying about the fact that we had somehow become white overnight."

"What happened then?"

"She took one look at her arms and dropped the gun in fright and ran into the bathroom sobbing, "Oh God Morris, what happened to us?"

"What did you say?"

"I didn't say anything. I just turned on the news to find out what the hell happened. It's almost air time, see you later."

"Okay."

"...And now the news with Morris Maxwell."

"Good evening. In tonight's news we have a report from Howard Gluckstern on the change of non- white Americans to white and comments by people on the street to the change. Also: Rob Roberts on the bicentennial celebration in Gettysburg, Pennsylvania; the passage overhead of the strange comet, and other stores, right after this word from Comet, the fast acting cleanser."...

"...Time now for the film clip on the reactions by the people in the street to today's weird occurences."

"Sir, have you ever been black?"

"I beg...no I insist on your pardon. I ain't never been no nigger and don't plan to be either. Noew you better git yourself away from me."

"I merely asked..."

"Don't give me that merely shit. Just asking me that question was insultin'".

"Yes I used to be black, and I was proud of it. I think it's very unfortunate that now I'm indistinguishable from that vast mass of Americans who have been through the melting pot and have lost touch with their cultural heritage."

"Don't you think you'll benefit from the fact that you will no longer be stigmatized by your color?"

"I think I've lost more than I've gained by this change. When I was black, it was easy to see the true nature of people. By that I mean if they had a nasty disposition they usually didn't try to cover it up whenever I was around. I was able to see their true ugliness."

"Who is they?"

"White, who do you think?"

"Are you saying that whites used to show one face or disposition to their fellow whites and their true negative nature to blacks?"

"Correct. Now I'll never know for sure if a person is full of hatred or not."

"What about your children? Aren't you happy that now they can grow up free of racial animosity?"

"You know, I really think it would've been better if they had remained black so they would be able to have compassion for all oppressed people."

"I see, thank you very much...Sir? How about you? How do you feel about the fact that black people have become white?"

"I'm the Grand Cyclop of the South Carolina Ku Klux Klan boy. What you you think I think about it?"

"I would imagine that you're happy you won't have to contend with black people any more."

"Right you are. Now that the Nigras have been dealt with, we can concentrate on them troublesome Jews and Catholics. It won't be long before..."

"Yes, thank you sir for your comments. This is John Hulk reporting from Times Square."

"The President reacted to the news by immediately convening a secret conference of his Cabinet and several eminent physicians and scientists. George Harcourt, the noteduphysician, made a brief statement this afternoon to the effect that the sudden change was brought about by the strange comet that just passed over us. He said he believes that the comet somehow altered the malanin level of blacks. Melanin is a genu in all humans that controls pigmentation or skin color. An unidentified physician proudly procqaimed "The Negro problem has finally been solved. Now America can move ahead unhindered by racism." Other stories in the news..."

"...and that's the news sports and weather for this evening. Good night...I still can't believe it. No joking guys, when I saw that story about the Negroes becoming white I thought it was just another one of your infantile pranks.

"When I saw Ray, I knew it was for real."

"It blew our minds too."

"You better believe it."

"...Not only did their skin coloration change but also their facial structure and hair texture. That's the part that really baffles me."

"Oh yeah? If you can understund just the change in skin color you're worthy of membership on that team the President suddenly set up to study the matter. The word from the "House" is that no one has any idea what even caused that."

"Come on, you know what I mean...Think about it for a minute. I mean about what that doctor said."

"Which one?"

"The one who said that racism has been eliminated. I think it's true. These "nouveauxblancs" or if you prefer Spanish, "nuevos blancos" will rapidly blend into the mainstream of American society. So now I don't have to feel guilty about their position in society. I'll be quite candid. I contributed heavily to things like the NAACP due to guilt feelings."

"Oh year, Morris?"

"...Hi Ray, I thought you had already gone home?"

"Don't let me interrupt, I'd like to hear what else you have to say about how good things will be now that just about everyone is white. I want to hear more about your guilt complex."

"...Well I've said all I wanted to say."

"Okay. Now let me fill you in on some news you may not have gotten. This change marks the end of one of your problems and the beginning of another. You see, now it'll be simple for the "nouveaux blancs" as you might say and the so-called "poor white trash" to unite and fight against this capitalist system that oppresses all of us."

"Look, don't talk to me about this being an oppressive capitalist society. I don't think you have any right to complain. Wouldn't you agree that you've benefitted a great deal from it? Aren't you comfortable?"

"No I'm not comfortable or content. I never will be until every American at least has a chance to obtain freedom from material need. When every American gets enough to eat each day, when every American gets adequate medical care and an adequate education, I'll feel content. Just because all of my people have become white their problems are not over. The reality of their day to day situation, you know, trying to earn a living, a decent living, will go on...The conditions of schools in "nouveaux blancs" areas certainly will not change immediately, just because the skin color of the children who attend those schools has changed."

"For a moment let's examine some of ths things you just said. You say you won't feel comfortable until every American has a chance to obtain freedom from material need..."

"Right."

"Then you'll never be comfortable because it's an endless cycle, the more middle class people get, the more the poor will want. In a few years qhoever doesn't own a color television set or washing machine will be considered impoverished."

"That's completely erroneous. I'm talking about people getting enough to eat. I'm talking about cheap, adequate housing, which is well within our capability to provide right now."

"But look."

"Morris,...good night, I've got to get home. See you tomorrow."

"Is it getting to hot for you?"

"I won't even bother to answer that. Think about what I said. That's all."

"That was delicious Doris."

"Glad you liked it. I've got to make that more often. How was your day?"

"It was the most surprising day ever. I really felt strange when the news about the blacks turning white..."

"...Oh damn that thing. I'll get it."

"...Who is it?"

"It's Hal Markowitz. He says you have to go back to the office because President Russworm's going to make some sort of statement tonight at 9. I wish you could stay home tonight."

"I'll ask him if Al Vann could go instead of me...Hello Hal?"

"Morris we've got to have you here tonight when Russworm makes his statement about today's strange events."

"Can't ah...can't Al Vann..."

"We can't find him. No one answered when we tried to call his house."

"Okay. What's Russworm expected to say?"

"Nobody seems to know. We only know that he spent all day talking to a large number of important scientists and influential doctors."

"...The President of the United States."

"Good evening ladies and gentlemen. As many of you may be aware of by now, Black Americans have recently undergone a miraculous change in their skin color. They are now considered to be Caucasians. During a conference I had just a short while ago with members of the Cabinet and noted physicians and scientists I was informed that this change was probably brought about by the strange comet that passed over us today. They told me that it caused an imbalance in the chemical melanin, which controls skin color. They have not, however, been able to account for the change in the skeletal structure and hair texture of blacks. This has raised the serious possibility of contamination. Since we do not know for certain whether or not the heretofore black people are diseased, it will be necessary to quarantine them in ghetto areas, and transport those living outside of these areas to the. When the doctors have definite proof that they are not diseased, the "nuevos blancos" as we have chosen to call them, can reenter the mainstream of America. I have nothing further to say and I will not answer any questions. Secretary of the Interior Jack Stevenson will explain the quarantine and relocation procedure for you. Thank you...Mr. Stevenson?"

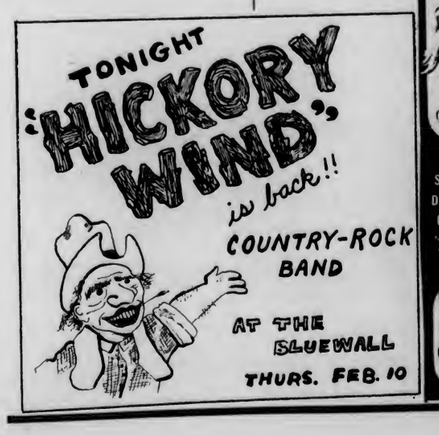
"T...Thank you, Mrs. President. What we considered doing at first was to build a number of internment camps across the country. We decided that it would be much easier to put up fences around ghetto areas and transport those few who live outside of these areas to them.

the first thing we intend to do is check birth records of all people who live in these areas and remove people who were born Caucasian. Then we'll check all birth records and income tax data so we can find out where all of the other "nuevos blancos" are. All of this should take only a week. We believe most people will be cooperative. The penalty for being uncooperative will be to pay a fine of $1000 or be separated from family and friends.

"Under the Emergency Aluen and Sedition Act that was passed this afternoon in a special session of Congress, anyone who makes any analogies between the establishment of these ghetto quarantine compounds and Hitler's concentration camps will be subject to a charge of treason and probably will be quarantined in one of these camps too."

"Secretary Stevenson, we've heard a lot about the change of the genes for the production of melanin in the skin of blacks. What does melanin have to do with disease? Do doctors feel that the change in this gene warrants isolation or internment?"

"It isn't really the change in the melanin that may cause the problem. The problem is that the comet may have altered other chemicals in blacks which may result in some sort of epidemic. We don't have any conclusive proof but we aren't taking any chances."



"Sir, why don't we put everyone in a camp, since we all may have been effected directly or indirectly by the comet. Don't you believe it's possible that Caucasians might have a delayed reaction?"

"We would rather not discuss that at this time.. I'm sorry gentlemen, I will answer no more questions."

Politics

The Revolt On The Right

By MATT TACKEFF

I. The Future of Conservatism

Early in 1967, M. Stanton Evans, a young political analyst from Indianapolis, published a volume entitled THE FUTURE OF CONSERVATISM. The thesis of that book was that the American electorate, which previously had no definite ideological leanings, would in the future be moving decidely to the right. Many reviewers accused Evans of wishful thinking, since he himself is one of America's most articulate Conservative theoreticians. On the other hand, some reviewers took the book seriously, noting that as the American people become more middle class, they would become increasingly hostile to government paternalism, welfare statism, regimentation, inflation, and other excesses which accompany the over-concentration of power in the hands of the federal government. It was therefore seen as a likelihood that the rightist point of view, which stresses individualism and decentralization, would become more relevant to the American people.

After the publication of Evans book, another book, THE EMERGING REPUBLICAN MAJORITY, by Kevin Phillips, also predicted a rightward trend of the electorate. Phillips, a 26 year old graduate of Harvard Law School, painstakingly presented his thesis in an elaborate fashion, complete with maps, charts, graphs, polls, historical analysis, and sociological data. The book was so convincing in its presentation, that in '68 Phillips was hired by John Mitchell, then the campaign chairman for Republican Presidential Candidate Richard M. Nixon.

Nixon, Mitchell, and the entire Republican National Committee took the Phillips Theory with complete seriousness, and mapped their campaign strategy around it. As a result, the Nixon strategy was a Conservative strategy, placing its emphasis on the "Middle American," who doesn't look to the Federal Government for a handout, but wants the Federal Government to get its hands out of his wallet. Nixon stressed that the Middle American is essentially self-reliant, and has little to gain, and perhaps much to lose, from an overcentralized and bureaucratic Federal Establishment.

Nixon's initiative was soon grasped by candidate Wallace, who subsequently spent less time kvetching about school integration, and more time denoucning the growth of statism, albeit in a much cruder and folksier fashion than did Nixon. Between Wallace and Nixon, the American voter was promised that his vote would reverse the trend toward bureaucracy, inflation, and statism, and a new era of individualism would prevail. Hubert Humphrey, who was nominated by a stormy and divided Democratic Convention in Chicago, continued to mouth stale old New Deal cliches as if they were fresh revelations.

The results of the '68 election proved decisively the validity of the Phillips theory. Nixon had won an election after a decidedly Conservative campaign, but most important of all, the election showed that Nixon's plurality, combined with Wallaces 13%, was a decisive repudiation of Liberalism.

The Phillips Theory, which had been tested and received the Republican seal of approval, sent the liberals into absolute conniptions. They damned his plan as the "Southern Strategy." Actually, it was noha southern, but a national strategy that includes the southern states. The liberals have never physchologically readmitted the South into the Union; they love the sidewalks of New York, but despise the suburbs of Atlanta. Phillips, who devised a workable theory which would effectively express the majority sentiment, was denounced by the media as a reactionary, a racist, and even as a provincial Southerner (he hails from the Bronx.)

II. President Nixon

Richard Nixon rode into the White House on a wave of Conservatism. Does this mean that Nixon is in reality a Right-wing ideologue? Definitely not. Nixon, who had been out of grace since he lost the California gubenatorial race in 1962, wanted most of all to recapture the limelight. Nixon never had a political ideology, for he has always been, in essence, a politician who would ride any wave, rightward or leftward, depending on which wave would carry him the farthest. The cold, hard facts are that Nixon is neither a Conservative, nor a Liberal, nor a 'pragmatist', nor a 'Centrist', although he can pretend to be any one of these. He is simply a politician with an all consuming ambition. Conservatism, as far as Nixon is concerned, is just a strategy with which to get votes, and not a set of personal convictions.

Nixon's apparent swing to the right conned most of the Conservatives in America into placing their faith in him. Senators Goldwater, Tower, Thurmund, and Dirksen, Congressman Ashbrook, and publicist William F. Buckley Jr. were just a few prominent Conservatives who became outspoken Nixon supporters. When Nixon finally received the trust of the Conservatives, he proceeded, slowly and quietly, to betray their trust and the trust of many Americans.

—Instead of eliminating a greater portion of the Democratic sponsored collectivist legislation, he for the most part left it intact and added more schemes of his own.

—Instead of being fiscally responsible, and fighting for a balanced budget, he proceeded to pile up enormous, and highly inflationary budgets.

—Instead of reducing the power of the Federal Government over the American people, he placed all Americans under the direct subjugation of wage and price controls.

—Instead of keeping up our strategic deterrent power, he has let our defenses stagnate while the Soviet Union is undergoing a massive military buildup.

It is apparent that Richard Nixon, although his rhetoric has been Conservative, has in fact moved this country sharply to the left. It was Nixon, not the Democrats, who proposed the extravagant "Family Assistance Plan" which would add millions of people to the welfare roles. It was Nixon, not the Democrats, who made the first overtures to the Communist Dictators of mainland China, an act which has seriously undermined the morale of our allies in Asia, and was a major factor in undermining the Nationalists in the United Nations. It was Nixon, not the Democrats, whose inflationary deficits would please the late John Maynard Keynes, but shrinks the purchasing power of all Americans. It was Nixon who clamped wage and price controls on the American people, in order to fight the inflation caused largely by his own fiscal policies. Despite what the far leftists may say, the direction of the Nixon Administration has been to the left. The Democrats are not being critical of Nixon's leftward drift, but of the fact that they aren't the ones presiding over that drift.

Although someliberals continue to see in Nixon the old 'Witch Hunter' who nabbed Alger Hiss, many liberals are pleased with the prospect of a Republican President moving the country to the left. The following are Liberal appraisals of the Nixon drift to the left:

(Roscoe Drummond) "Whatever happened to the conservative Richard Nixon? Here he is in the lead for the most far ranging, ground breaking, daring social welfare reform since the early days of the New Deal....Nixon is acting to carry out an immensely liberal concept and liberal program. How liberal? If you define modern liberalism as a willingness to use the Federal Government to achieve major social ends, then the Presidents program is very liberal."

(Carl T. Rowan) "Imagine someone telling you twenty years ago that a Republican President would ask congress to provide a minimum annual income to every American family.

You would have laughed your informant out of town."

(James Reston) "It is true that Nixon first rose to power as an opponent of the New Deal, but once he assumed the responsibilities of the Presidency, he began moving to an advocacy of the Welfare State."

Whenever the conservative Republicans criticized Nixon's drift into collectivism, he would send Sprio Agnew out to make some sort of statement which would placate those of conservative sentiment. This tactic of using Agnew as a decoy was effective for the first few months of his administration, but even Agnew and the cries of "party unity" were not enough to keep the irritated not enough to keep the irritated conservatives silent indefinately. One liberal Republican, obviously pleased with Nixon, proclaimed that "the conservatives get the rhetoric, we get the action." This fall, however, many rightists came to realize that rhetoric won't reverse the trend toward statism. Only action would. Many conservatives openly broke with Nixon. Organizations such as The American Conservative Union, the Americans for Constitutional Action, the Young Americans for Freedom, and most major conservative publications such as National Review, Human Events, and Battle Line, all called for conservatives to withdraw their support of the President. The major conservatives in the Republican party, such as Goldwater, Tower, Reagan, Taft, Thurmond and Brock were all reluctant to break with Nixon, fearing that such a break would split the Republican Party and pave the way for a Democratic victory. Few intelligent conservatives would consider supporting Wallace as an alternative, for most conservatives recognize that the racism of Wallace helps to frighten many people into voting for a liberal.

III. John Ashbrook to the Rescue

John Ashbrook is a congressman from Ohio. At age 42, he has been serving in the House for twelve years. He is the ranking Republican on two major House Committees. He has been affiliated with the Young Republicans, the Young Americans for Freedom, and for five years was the chairman of the American Conservative Union. He is generally regarded to be one of the most articulate spokesmen of the Conservative philosophy in the United States. For three years he waited patiently for Nixon, whom he had previously supported, to live up to his campaign promises. But patience is no longer a virtue, in Rep. Ashbrook's opinion, when there is so much at stake. With little support from big name Republicans, and very little money, John Ashbrook had the courage to say that if nobody stood up to the President on the vital issues, he would have to. Last December Ashbrook announced that he would provide the much needed Right opposition in the Presidential primaries. With a very shakey foundation, he proceeded to enter the various state primaries.

Many conservatives have expressed skepticism at the prospects of such a venture. They feel that there is no other alternative than to back the President and hope for the best. But faith in Nixon, by anybody, has historically proven to be risky business. The President is thinking less about the next generation and more about the next election. Support for Ashbrook, by a large segment of the Republican Party, would be an enormous pressure on the President. When elections are at stake, the President has been more than willing to respond to pressure.

Ashbrook's first test is in the New Hampshire primary. At this point, it is very difficult to assess his prospects. His financial assets are limited. But he has more important assets than money. He has the unqualified support of the states leading Newspaper, and has a sizable brigade of youthful canvassers, most of whom are members of the Young Americans for Freedom. Many observers have predicted that he has very little chance of getting any more than fifteen or twenty percent of the vote, but these same observers predicted a landslide victory for Lyndon Johnson in the 1968 primary. The Republican Party in New Hampshire is fundamentally conservative, and if Ashbrook can show the discrepancy between the rhetoric of Spiro Agnew and the actions of the administration, many voters will see that a vote for Ashbrook will be a vote for Nixon to either live up to his '68 promises or step down.

With a respectable showing in New Hampshire, and an anticipated better showing in Florida, Ashbrook's campaign will get the attention which it most rightfully deserves. The American electorate will be told that Richard Nixon is not the same guy that they voted for in 1968.

Perhaps there are many ideological nonconformists who are reading this article, and agree that there is a vital need for the Ashbrook campaign to reach the American voters. The most urgent need at the present time is for activists to volunteer to spread the message to the New Hampshire voters. If you feel that such a campaign must be promulgated to the greatest possible degree, and are willing to help in the promulgation, please contact this writer as soon as possible. Telephone number is 546-6798. This weekend I can be reached in Boston at 617-566-5453. Let's show Nixon that the people who put him in the Whitehouse in '68 demand that he live up to his campaign promises.

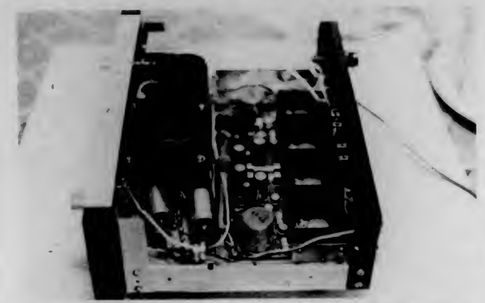
Amplifiers: The Source Of Power-Part Two

By FRANK JOHNSON

Last week we took a look at how amplifiers perform and how their output is measured. Today we'll discuss other relevant specifications, and how these measurements relate to quality and suitability to intended use.

The first specification, frequency response, should be familiar to us by now. Actually, frequency response is apt to be widest in an amplifier as opposed to another device like a transducer, because there is no performance-limiting factor such as mechanical coupling to impede a wide frequency response. Therefore, an amplifier frequency response should be as wide as possible (at least 20-200 Hz. or better), exceeding other components in the set if necessary.



But wide frequency response is meaningless if it is accompanied by distortion. The Institute of High Fidelity (IHF) realized this some time ago and developed a specification called power bandwidth, in which the frequency response of a power amplifier is measured at one-half power and at a reference point of distortion, usually 1%. If the power bandwidth is a narrow one, tapering off at the high and low end of the audio spectrum, then we know that the amp won't be able to deliver all that we expect it to, even at less stringent levels of one-half power.

Incorporating transistors into amplifiers has had both its good and bad points. Though the price has gone down and the quality increased for amps in general, some confusion has resulted, stemming from the fact that transistors are more efficient at low impedences, because they usually are directly coupled to the speaker. Loudspeakers are rated at a common impedence-either 4, 8, or 16 ohms, which forms a resistance to the output current of the amp. Higher resistances restrict output and thus less power is delivered as it increases; 8 ohms presents a greater resistance than 4 ohms, and while tube amplifiers deliver a constant output to the speaker because they are coupled by output transformers to the proper output impedience, transistor amplifiers generally are not so soupled and if less resistance is presented to them, they will deliver more power.

Advertisers are quick to realize this, and unscrupulous salesmen will rate an amplifier at 4 ohms instead of the usual 8, allowing a higher output spec but at the same time realizing that most transistor amplifiers deliver less distortion at 8 ohms than at 4 ohms. Another dishonest technique is to disregard the RMS (clipping) spec and tend toward the more lenient IHF or "music power" specification, which allows a 1% distortion figure. The argument for this spec is that music is actually a series of peaks and not a steady input to the amplifier. However, because the IHF figure can represent wishful thinking, honest manufacturers avoid using it altogether. This is only one step removed from the very lenient Electronics Industry Association (EIA) practice of using "peak power" or "peak music power", allowing 5% distortion and also making no reference to possible breakdown or even explosion of the amplifier! Only the appliance-maker consoles will use the EIA specification- they cannot combine EIA and IHF figures legally- and this explains why cheap consoles apparently seem so powerful. A rule of the thumb is to divide the EIA figure by 10, which will give a rough indication of an RMS figure (although it won't say anything about frequency response).

Not content to stop with the above practices, advertisers also sometimes make note of the fact that transistor stereo amplifiers will deliver slightly more power if only one channel is driven, instead of both channels at the same time. This is a lower drain on the power supply, and the amplifier will again seem more powerful than it actually is compared to other makes. Look for the specification that says: "both channels driven, one channel measured". If the distinction is not made, untrue power output should immediately be suspect.

Finally, one other unscrupulous practice is to introduce the "— 1 db" specification. At first glance, this small deviation from 0 db or constant output may seem minor. Actually, if the power output is allowed to deviate by a possible 2 db, a theoretical 20% reduction in power is possible. This means that a "100 watt" amplifier, when rated via the — 1 db method, instantly becomes an 80 watt amplifier. The justification for such deception is vulnerability of one equipment maker to the apparently higher specifications of his competitors. But knowledgeable buyers will discern such practices in order to avoid purchasing substandard power amplifiers, which feature such gaudy specifications under the conditions enumerated above.

Photograph of a high quality power amplifier. Power output, RMS at clipping, is 29.5 watts per channel, both channels driven, one channel measured. Amplifier is Pioneer model SM-700.

Special thanks is expressed to Amherst Audio, Inc., for permission to reproduce this photograph without copyright.

There are some other incidental considerations that might interest amplifier buyers. These are: damping factor (the radio of total internal impedence of the amplifier as 0.8 ohms and comparing it with the output impedence of 8 ohms, the norm. The damping factor here would be 10. Although damping factor is not a crucial specification (any figure over 10 and increasing to 1,000 or more is quite adequate), it can give some idea of how tightly the amplifier will control low bass to a loudspeaker. Transistor amps, which tend to have lower impedences than tube types, will generally have higher damping factors and thus the low bass will sound "cleaner", all factors being equal.

Any high-power amplifier should have quick-acting protective devices to guard the output transistors from possible damage in high output conditions. This may take 3 forms: 1.) simple speaker fuses, apart from the main power fuse, which break the circuit in case of overload and protect both the amp and the speakers; 2.) thermal overload protection when the transistors get too hot, and 3.) actual circuit breakers, which monitor the current and turn off the amp in overload conditions. Any of these devices is useful and in general the more protection the better, although nos. 2 and 3 are perhaps the handiest to have, obviating frequent fuse replacement which must be accomplished each time the circuit is broken.

Lastly, of all the components in the set, the amplifier should have the least hum and noise of all. The amount of hum and noise present is expressed in - db, or the amount of output expressed in db to one db of hum and noise. It is not too much to expect a power amplifier to have -90 db hum and noise or better at the very least, in order to keep the noise within the set from being cumulative (increasing with each component's contribution).

At this point a powerful and hopefully clean signal is about to reach the loudspeaker, and we'll see how it comes out in the next issue, which, like this one, will also be divided into two parts.

Incredible! Live! Country Joe!

By MIKE KOSTEK

Incredible-Live! Country Joe! (Vanguard)

"My obsession for a long time was to be Bob Dylan, to do what he did. But I haven't communicated really directly what I'm doing yet–if I can I'll feel successful. I set out seven years ago to communicate this non-verbal thing with my music; my sound, my personality, me. The same way when you listen to Robert Johnson, you know that 's him–nobody can really imitate it, because it's exactly him. That's what I want to get–and to have people either dig me or hate me."–Country Joe McDonald.

In those seven years Country Joe has done the following:

Formed a looney, talented band called Country Joe & The Fish. They roared out of Oakland-Berkley in 1967 at the same time the San Francisco bands, The Dead, Airplane, Quicksilver et. al. were starting. The Fish were one of the first bands to sign a record contract, and their first album Electric Music For Mind and Body is far better than the debut albums of any American rock groups of that time. Electric Music remains an excellent album, and contains the widely varied fare that all the Fish's albums have; dope songs ("Flying High"), good blues ("Death Sound Blues"), filthy rock ("Happiness Is A Porpoise Mouth") great political ditties ("Superbird") and some of the best "psychedelic" music ever made ("Not So Sweet Martha Lorraine", "Section 43". "The Masked Marauder"). "I was into some really far out stuff then -- those songs, those arrangements. I was playing with sound, echos, water dripping, bells--going from silence to no silence--A lot of textile changes."--Joe

Made I-Feel-Like-I'm-Fixin'-To-Die, another great album, featuring of course "The Fish Cheer & I Feel-Like-I'm-Fixin'-To Die Rag". Again there were more blues ("Rock Coast Blues"), more great rock ("Eastern Jam") more psychedelics (I know the word has become outmoded, but there's none better yet) ("Colors For Susan", "Magoo"), and the first of a great series of great love songs, ("Janis"). Janis was for Janis Joplin who wanted Joe to write a song to commerate their love affair. "It was a very casual sort of thing. We were both into being with the band, our bands were really tight at the time. ...we didn't work together so it just kind of spread itself apart."

Released Together which was recorded while the Fish were falling apart. Again it followed the Fish formula with varied song styles and subjects. Together is a very disjointed album due to the fact that the rest of the Fish tried songwriting for the first time, and Joe has only two compositions on the album. However this album contained the fine "Rock And Soul Music" in its original 6:51 entirety unlike the shortened Woodstock version. Together also marked the last recording of the original Fish--Bary Melton, David Cohen, Bruce Barthol and Chicken Hirsh. One of the finest bands ever. These three albums are absolutely unique in all of music because they are the most successful synthesis of all types of American music, spiced with sensitive and original lyrics, arranged impeccably and performed superbly.

After the Fish broke up, Joe and lead guitarist Barry Melton made Here We Are Again.. I guess the "we" in the title meant Barry and Joe, for the rest of the musicians on the album were either studio cats or friends just sitting in. Here We Are Again, is a bizarre album featuring horns and three or four 1930's type arrangements that don't really work. However, as with every album Joe records, there are at least two or three cuts that are absolute gems and are well worth the price of the album. Included here are "Here I Go Again", "Donovan's Reef", Barry's "Doctor Of Electricity" and Joe's greatest blues, "Crystal Blues". Here We Are Again came out in May of 1969, and in March, 1970, Joe and Barry were back with-

C.J. Fish, featuring a new lineup and with a mediocre collection of songs played very woodenly. No great cuts here, just several good ones. C.J. Fish was dissappointing enough to be the biggest letdown of 1970 and to cast doubt on the Fish's future.

The doubts were well founded, because Joe left the Fish after C.J. Fish and became a solo "folk" act (aren't these grossly inaccurate labels?). "...one of the reasons that I stopped singing rock and roll was because I was blowing my voice out." This was a strange period for Joe, as he hopped all over. He popped up on the Woodstock soundtrack and in the movie as both leader of the Fish and as Country Joe McDonald with only his accoustic guitar, singing with the bouncing ball. Before this he and the Fish had appeared in Monterey Pop in a subdued performance. Before that the Fish had done several songs (along with Steve Miller. The Dead and Quicksilver) in a poor picture called Revolution. After Woodstock Joe turned up on the Celebration soundtrack (from the 1970 Big Sur folk festival). Joe and the Fish had done some songs for an obscure crazy California picture called Gas-s-s which has been released, but has wallowed in obscurity. Also, just before the last aggregiate of Fish broke up, the appeared in an did a few songs for a rather dismal movie called Zachariah (starring Elvin Jones, The James Gang, and featuring several scenes written by The Firesign Theatre). After that Joe did several songs for the movie version of Henry Miller's dirt book, Quiet Days In Clichy, Vanguard released a terrible collection of Country Joe & The Fish's supposed Greatest Hits, which was barely thirty minutes long, but did feature a delightful picture of Joe and the Fish doing the show biz-Al Jolson type kneel stark raving nude. Somewhere Joe found time to record two albums in Nashville, Thinking Of Woodie Gunthrie and Tonight I'm Singing Just For You. Rolling Stone said about the Guthrie album "An album of nostalgia and an album of affirmation; if you have never heard of Woodie Guthrie, or were never sure what he was all about, let Country Joe be your introduction. He knows the way." Tonight I'm Singing Just For You didn't fare so well critically, but it was still an able performance by Joe. Both these albums were with the usual Nashville Cats, those peerless session men, so neither album lacks supporting talent.

Country Joe McDonald

One of Joe's best albums (and one of the best albums of 1971 and easily the most overlooked of last year) was his collection of Robert Service's World War I poems set to music. The album of Joe singing Service's poems came out last summer and is stunning. Joe's beautiful, appropriate melodies and his masterful singing combine with Service's lyrics to make War War War the finest anti-war album ever made. War War War transcends all time and space, grabbing the listener into Service's horrible world. The first time I listened I found myself wishing the song to quickly end so as to spare the characters in it the terrible fate of the others in the previous songs. "The Ballad Of Jean Despree" is the only song I've ever heard that achieves a cathartic effect on the listener, while "The March Of The Dead" was 1971's finest track. "This stuff all taps that death fear with beautiful melodies, cliche lyrics and passe subject matter–it's your own mind that makes the connections up, and brings it home–right now. I'm tired of all this bullshit in the movement--all these people are supposed to be into heavy stuff, well they can listen to this–it'll blow their heads off."–Joe.

About last spring the big trend in the album world was for big single stars to make a solo record with their superstar friends. Most of these were very bad. Country Joe took a whack at this formula with Hold On-It's Coming, a fine record made with Spencer Davis, Peter Green, the famous Alex Dmochowski and a host of others. This album was snazzily subtitled "Terror On Tin-Pan Alley: A Saga Of Loose Strings And Fast Music". Well, it wasn't really a saga inside the jacket, but it shows that at least some imagination went into the album packaging. Although Hold On has no great cuts, it is still a fine record.

About this same time Vanguard decided to try again to cash in on the Fish, and released a double album called–get ready–The Life And Times of Country Joe And The Fish From Haight-Ashbury To Woodstock. At $5.98 list price it sells for as much as a regular Fish album, so it is an especially good deal for those millions who have never picked up on the Fish. The first record is a much better "greatest hits" selection than the aforementioned official Greatest Hits package, with a strange 1965 washtub jug band recording of "I-Feel-Like-I'm-Fixin'-To-Die Rag". The second record is more of a curiosity piece, and less of a success to listen to. It is the Fish live at various places (Fillmore East, Fillmore West & Woodstock). All the songs have been recorded before and the live versions lose something in the transition from their original studio perfection.

As a small footnote to the band's popularity, Country Joe & The Fish were actually honored by being bootlegged, in a small way however. They were on something called Woodstock National, sharing the bill with five other groups, recorded at some festival and in terrible sound yet. However the fact remains, that the Fish were bootlegged and do "Not So Sweet Martha Lorraine" and a jam called "Barry's Caviar Jam". A collectors item that will ellude the grasp of many I'm sure.

And now to the present. Incredible! Live! Country Joe! is a recording of him at a small cafe in New York, The Bitter End (the same place where the Brothers Four and the Village Stompers and all the hootenanniers made their live albums too). Just Joe and his guitar and a bunch of new songs, cogent raps and good times for all. There is a beautiful love song ("Sweet Marie"), political ditties ("Kiss My Ass", "Tricky Dicky", "Deep Down In Our Hearts"), personal introspection ("Fly So High", "Entertainment Is My Business") and even an instrumental that could have come right off Electric Music ("Walk In Santiago"). Is the album good? In the liner notes Studs Turkel writes:

"Irony and humanism. To survive, or, at least, hang onto a semblence of sanity, in a time of such madness–with the exhilaration and terror that go along–a young artist must be possessed of these two attributes country Joe is so possessed. Salubriously. Thus he reaches out to his peers.

"In this album, the laughter is a touch more gentle. Love as well as politics is celebrated. Tenderness pervades. Yet, Country Joe obstinately punches out at the lowgoofiness in high places that so imperils tenderness."

Yes the album is good. Yes the tunes are catchy, mixed, sung and played masterfully. Yes there are a couple that aren't that good, but they are certainly not bad. And yes, the album is not selling at all. The day I bought it I bought half the supply in Amherst.

So here he is, with 11 albums (not counting the Greatest Hits, made with the Fish or by himself, he's on parts of 7 others, he's in 3 movies, he played at Woodstock (twice) and Monterey, tried to sing the "Fixin'-To-Die Rag" to Judge Hoffman on the witness stand at the Chicago Seven Trial, played on the closing night of the Fillmore East and most recently has been playing of Jane Fonda's FTA shows before pulling out after accusing her of snobbery towards the troops. Now supposedly the singing one-man minstrels have returned to dominate the music scene. James Taylor sits home on Martha's Vineyard. Bob Dylan sits in New York and everyone gets excited about a song like "George Jackson". Neil Young, Stills, Crosby & Nash do "Ohio" and "Chicago" and break up again. Cat Stevens' last three albums are identical sounding and he certainly packs no punch. The Paxton's, the Rush's come off as positively effete next to Joe.

Country Joe sings, writes and plays blues, rock, country, folk, psychedelic (with occasional jazz arrangements yet) in a most special way. There are few others who combine their lifestyles so much with their music (Joan Baez and the new John Lennon maybe). He writes lots of songs, maybe too many (you could take one song from each album and make the best "Greatest hits" ever. The most disinterested kibitzer can see he is one of our best music makers and in terms of volume, he is by far the most ignored. Either dig him or hate him, but don't ignore him.

Simon Proves His Own Worth

By BILL DENSMORE

The acknowledged lyrical strength of the one-time folk group "Simon & Garfunkel" has struck out on his own, at least for one album, and perhaps for good. Since the release a few years ago of Bridge Over Troubled Water, it's been pretty obvious that Paul Simon had outgrown the idiom of folk music as a means of expression. Traditionally folk music has meant one or two guitarists with perhaps a fiddle or bass violin singing simple, topical tunes. By definition, therefore, Paul Simon is not a folk album, and neither was Bridge Over Troubled Waters. When the team of "Simon & Garfunkel" abandoned the two guitar harmony in favor of strings, flutes, vibes, and harmonicas they moved into the realm of popularized mood music. So it's not surprising that Paul Simon should not appear without his partner, for as good as Art Garfunkel was, he is no longer needed. Still, I miss his enfolding voice, and Mr. Simon just doesn't sound the same by himself.

Paul Simon is lovable. No matter what the words say, you always end up convinced that everything will be all right in the end. Even when Mr. Simon comes out with, "Anyway you choose you're bound to lose in New York City" or "In A couple of days they come and "Take me away" or "It's carbon and monoxide/The ole Detroit perfume" you just keep on smiling because the music is so innocent. In traditional folk style, the score always had to fit the lyrics. If you talked about war the music had to sting or be tinged with dischord. But "Armistice Day" is ambiguous at best, and neither a calypso percussion by Airto Moreira nor horns by Fred Lipsius (remember B,S, & T.?) help to remove the ambiguity.

"Armistice Day" is not the only ambiguous song. Perhaps "Paranoia Blues" is the only tune that makes a clear statement–a reaction to living in New York City. If there was ever any doubt about Paul Simon being a poet, there can't be any now.

Songs common to "Simon & Garfunkel", like "The Sounds of Silence" or "A Most Peculiar Man" were easy to understand by the end of the first verse; but an understanding of this lp is elusive, and perhaps that is the reason for its general ambiguity. Each groove soothes you, perhaps you find yourself grinning at every verse. After five or six plays of the album you feel the impact of Paul's sophisticated intricacies. Paul Simon has always been a complex and engaging writer, but it has taken this album and freedom from an imposed traditional folk style to bring to fruition

I should justify calling Paul Simon a poet. The degree of interpretation possible with modern rock is usually limited to an emotional reaction to lyrics augmented by music. James Taylor, for instance, is very skillful at presenting images and feelings with his songs, but he cannot be called a poet because his use of words is too loose. When you remove the music from the best songs on "Paul Simon", such as "Duncan" or "Me and Julio Down by the Schoolyard", there's something left besides a prose statement. The words tell a story, in the former a fisherman's son growing up, the latter an absurd crime in New York City. On "Paul Simon" the meaning of most songs is not always synonymous with the meaning of the story line, rather it is based on words used at a second level, taken out of context with the story. It is here that the music of a song cak reverse the conclusion reached by listening to the words and after the overall meaning of a piece one hundred and eighty degrees.

It is this counteraction and interplay between words and music that makes Paul Simon ultimately a happy experience, for whatever is dismal in the reality of the lyrics is neutralized by the music. The album opens with "Mother and Child Reunion", a delightful calypso beat recorded in Jamaica. With a chorus of four smoothly modulated female voices adding substance, the song sounds like a more professional version of "Nassau's Gone Funky" a song popular last summer. It is unlike anything Paul Simon has ever done before:

No I would not give you false hope
On this strange and mournful day
But the mother and child reunion
Is only a motion away..."

Along with "Me and Julio Down by the schoolyard", "Mother and Child Reunion" is the most original piece of music recorded recently, and both songs come off as the best cuts on the whole lp. "Duncan" is an example of the duality between music and words that Simon is capable of. The music is slow, intimate, and penetrating, and uses the flute in the same manner as "El Condor Pasa"on Bridge Over Troubled Water. The story line is typical in that it tells in very general terms of Lincoln Duncan's first sexual experience. It is only on the second or third listening that you realize Simon is carping a supposedly sacred event:

Couple in the next room
Bound to win a prize
They've been going at it all night long

Duncan goes to "Sweet New England" via the turnpike, a decidedly unsweet image, and come across "a young girl in a parking lot" preaching the Bible. The young girl takes him to the woods:

Saying here comes something and it feels so good
And just like a dog I was befriended. I was befriended.

Finally, Duncan is lying underneath the stars "thanking the Lord/for my fingers."

"Peace Like a River" is a natural sequel to "Me and Julio Down by the Schoolyard" because though the music is entirely different it deals lyrically with the same thing. In referring to a midnight curfew, wires, chains, rules, and glorious days it represents the calm after an urban storm–perhaps a riot. "You can't outrun the history train/I've seen a glorious day."

"Papa Hobo" and "Hobo's Blues" are conflicting musically. "Papa Hobo" is the saddest tune on the album, evoking a strong feeling of loneliness until you read the words printed on the slipcover for the record and realize that for Papa Hobo there is no sadness--only recurrent cities. "Hobo's Boues" is a brief, exciting instrumental using only violin and guitar in the style of the twenties or thirties.

If nothing else, most of the songs on this album have in common their talent–and comment on the urban jungle. Thus, "Paranoia Blues" is the focal point of the album:

I got the paranoia blues
From knockin' around in New York City...
...There's only one thing I need to know
Whose side are you on....

Paul Simon has its failures musically, particularly "everything Put Together Falls Apart" and "Congratulations", but Simon has proved, without the epic quality of Bridge Over Trouble Water that he can be as enthralling without Art Garfunkel as with.

The Human Dynamo Strikes Again

BY GARY GOMES

Roland Kirk's new album still doesn't answer the question: "When is this man going to fall over and die from sheer exhaustion?" From every indication on this album the answer is probably "Never!"

I first saw Roland Kirk some four years ago on an educational network, with, of all people, John Cage, a "serious" composer whose basic belief is that everything and anything can be music (i.e. traffic, typewriters, your parents yelling at you at the tops of their lungs--anything!). I was staggered because of Cage's reported dislike of jazz–but then the combination began to make sense.

You see, Kirk is the walking music. He is blind, so appearances don't mean much to him. All he feels is the vibrations of the music in the air around him. He plays about forty "conventional" musical instruments, and a myriad of others which have yet to reach the hallowed halls as "respectable, serious" musical instruments. On this particular program, Kirk was to be seen handing out "nose flutes" to the audience and leading a group of children playing slide whistles. The Pied Piper of jazz. This was interspersed with comments by Cage about whether or not it was music, and also with "live" performances by Kirk's group. (Kirk pushing the drummer; Kirk playing three saxophones himself–in harmony!; Kirk exhorting the other members of the group to play harder while playing three instruments himself!)

As it turns out, Kirk has become somewhat of a living legend and it gets damn hard evaluating a living legend. I mean what can you say about a man who never stops expanding and refreshing his musical resources! Stop?!! Goddamn it, I'm not going to ask him to stop!

Let's say you were walking down the street and met up with some rock musician and asked him his favorite jazz artists. Chances are that along with Miles Davis (highly overrated, in my opinion), John Coltrane (who's dead), Charlie Mingus, and, if the cat was weird enough, maybe Cecil Taylor or Ornette Coleman, you'd inevitably get a lot of responses in favour of Rahsaan Roland Kirk. A blind man, you understand, one of the chief innovators on the flute, one of the most popular Jazz artists, one of the stylistic movers in Jazz, a man who can and does play everything he can–and I say this man is one incredible musician. (How many other legitimate jazz artists would have the guts to jam with the Mothers of Invention? But he's blind, so Zappa's hand signals didn't mess him up.) Kirk is a perennial poll winner both the readers' and Critics' polls in down beat, one of the best music magazines round (most often on manzello and stritch, two instruments he picked up at an old broken-down pawn shop, and mastered as one.) His albums have always proved unique and eclectic, from the far-out "Inflated Tear" to his last recording "Natural Black Inventions" on which he played every instrument himself with the exception of a 'sound tree' played by Joe Texidor. No overdubs.

Actually, Kirk's main problem is to outdo what Kirk has done before, which is well nigh impossible, but he does it anyway.

Kirk's new album leans towards more accessible music than he has played in the past, including such 'soul' standards as "My Girl" and such traditional numbers as "Old Rugged Cross". However, although a traditionalist and interpreter (in the best sense of these words), Rahsaan always adds a new spark to what he's performing, in order to let you know that it is Rahsaan. On "My Girl" and the beautifully orchestrated "Ain't No Sunshine", Kirk sings the words (very softly) while he is playing the flute. It adds a new dimension that you conceivably might not have heard before and might never hear again on that song. His treatment of two other Motown songs on the album in a medley, Marvin Gaye's "What's Goin' On" and "Mercy Mercy Me (The Ecology)" are well done, with Kirk interrupting the proceedings with well-timed police-whistle blasts.

On every Kirk album to date, Rahsaan has done some talking to introduce or add to the numbers. The most effective and humorous of these monologues is done on "Old Rugged Cross" where Kirk talks about the black cross, the white cross, the crisscross, so that you don't get crossed up with what you're doing. "And even if some jive accident–I mean president..." A deliberate cross-up, I'm sure. Anyroad, it connects off in a way that Zappa's "Road Ladies" does. It is deliberately and deliberatively insane, in a manner which Rahsaan can achieve alone. The number then breaks into the old spiritual from which it was taken, and the group cooks really well.

"I Love You, Yes I Do" is a very soulful ballad, with Roland's very able tenor sax work backed by cocktail lounge organ (played by Mickey Tucker–and before you turn that off, I would say that Lee Michaels' organ work on "Stormy Monday Blues" is about as cocktail lounge as any I've heard. Most of those dudes can really kick ass.) This song along with the follower, "Take Me Girl", might be good candidates for an "Easy Listening" station, if it weren't for Rahsaan's neck twisting tenor sax playing. (If any of you might have heard Kirk's lunatic version of "I Say A Little Prayer for You", then you know what I'm talking about. Muzak into music that captures the attention.)

Princess Patience Burton sounds impressive on the track that she wrote, called "One Nation", which sounds Carribean or Calypso in nature. Rahsaan here does some work with the two saxophones and quite well at that.

"Never Can Say Goodbye" is a spirited rock-jazz jam (you have to watch how those words are placed, or you'll come up with different meanings-rock-jazz is different than jazz-rock: it's the source that determines the latter word in the hyphenation.) The group, egged on by Roland, does some really nasty blowing on this and two other tracks, "Make It With You" and the title track "Blacknuss".

The last begins with another monologue on how Roland is going to use just the black notes on the piano (the sharps and flats which together with the diatonic scale-do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, ti-make up the chromatic scale. But then, as Captain Beefheart once said, "Scales are for fish." Gee, I thought I was getting into a scholarly discourse there for a minute.) Anyway, this choice of notes gives the beginning of the piece, a beautiful, exotic, harpiike quality (with African drumming going on in the background). It abruptly breaks into a hard-driving extravaganza, with Kirk yelling "Blacknuss" at the top of his formidable lungs.

But wait, I'm not finished yet. The highlight of this set is a flute extravaganza on side one. Kirk's style, which was copped by Ian Anderson, is deep and full. The solo damn nears blows your head off and it is characterized by Kirk's enthusiastic screams and singing. Quite remarkable!

At last report, Kirk was seen jamming with a jet taking off.

By JIM LAVRAKAS

Two different movies with two different heroes somehow manage to draw from the viewer a very similar attitude response. With plots so opposite in timing, revelation, characterization, architecture of story line, use of locale, use of dialogue, and use of technical facilities, "Dirty Harry" and "Straw Dogs" produce a particular response from the viewer. The response is a specific one that the two movies carefully, and deliberately pull from the audience. The response that these two films wins from the viewer is a very obvious patriotism of the super masculine (almost chauvinistic) ideal.

I used the word win in my last statement, and it's an important word. It means that the response of the viewer is one which the films very adroitly, and overwhelmingly pull from the viewer. The viewer could resist if he were not watching two films so marvelously made. Understanding how this response is won is integral in understanding the response itself.

There are many ways of portraying a hero. One kind of hero is the man who is a great coward, hides his cowardice from himself and the rest of the world (and feels guilt for this), then, once discovered must prove himself, and finally, successfully does this. This is David Sumner (Dustin Hoffman) in "Straw Dogs". This kind of hero we detest because we are all cowards at some time in our lives. We are drawn to him though.

The other kind of hero is perfectly agreeable to us. We will always identify with him because he is the exact opposite of the first hero. He is a superman, does super things for the cause of justice, and wins (that's important). This is Harry Callahan (Clint Eastwood) in "Dirty Harry".

The charisma that goes along with Detective Harry Callahan is what really draws the viewer to him. Clint Eastwood is excellent in the part. How many actors can successfully whisper lines like: "When I see a naked male chasing a female with a butcher knife and a hard-on I don't figure he's out collecting for the Red Cross". To the Mayor (John Vernon) he says, "Well, for the last three-quarters of an hour I've been sitting on my ass in your outer office waiting on you." The quintessence of audacity! As for balls, Harry hardly flinches as he is shot in the process of incapacitating three bank robbers single-handedly. He is so cool, so independent. The viewer identifies with this independence.

When Harry does finally get a partner, Chico (Reni Santoni), to work with, the scenes with the two of them are reminiscent of an old Batman show. In the scene in the alley-way, for instance, after Harry is beaten by a few of the locals who mistake him for a peeper, Harry and Chico race back to their cruiser. The camera silouettes them in the alley light and their coats trail behind them like capes. Like a super hero, also, there are different versions of how Harry got his nickname. We are told that "he always gets the shit end of the stick" and he gets "every dirty job that comes around." There is a kind of martyrdom that Harry shows with his nickname. This is great for the image.

Considering image, it is interesting to observe at the end of "Dirty Harry" just before Harry wings Scorpio with an incredible cowboy style shot in the shoulder, that the background at the quarry was very reminiscent of one of the old westerns Eastwood starred in.

This kind of thing builds on Harry's charisma but the viewer learns certain facts about Harry that are reinforcing for not only his image but in winning the battle to involve the viewer. Harry's wife was killed by a drunk in a head-on auto accident. Harry is without a woman (in effect, so is David Sumner) and is compelled to bury himself in his work (like David Sumner). For Harry and the audience it is necessary, therefore, for there to be some sort of obvious symbol of manhood. For Harry it is his gun: "a fourty-four Magnum that could blow your head clean off", says Harry. When the homicidal-maniac first glimpses the magnificent instrument he says in awe, "My, that's a big one." Symbolism of this sort is not rampant in either film but it is an important aspect in understanding Harry, especially, and understanding your reaction to him. A gun is a ready phallic sumbol and is used as such in these two films.

We can easily understand the charisma that stands behind Harry Callahan. It is not so much charisma and image that make David Sumner an easy character to identify with as it is just plain circumstance. It is the circumstances of his attempted respite in England that draws the audience into his "justified" killing of five men. Justified is another important word here. I feel that anyone (except the most extreme of pacifists) would kill if the killing was justified. In "Straw Dogs" we are given circumstance after circumstance that build a case toward justifying the killing of five of the locals. We gladly become David Sumner. I think that many people would like to kill another human being if only out of curiosity. People may think these kinds of thoughts but may never follow them though. David Sumner obviously has thought these thoughts before (out of inferiority and insecurity) and when he does prove himself he is overjoyed: "Jesus, I killed them all", he says. Many people may never kill for themselves but they can experience "justified" killing in both these films.

There are also facts about David Sumner that make him an easy character to relate to. There is a feeling from the start that this man, no matter how puny and small, can and will win battles in the end. His no nonsense attitude towards his work is one indication of this. Most important, however, is his scientific mind. A very organized and directed kind of thinking comes from him (witness the exercises and the clockwinding before going to bed). It is impossible for him to lose in the end the viewer subconsciously knows. The viewer is right. And the viewer is drawn further into the film.

There are several comments that Harry makes that are part of an attitude that this film takes towards education and intellectualism. When he first meets Chico, a graduate of San Jose College, he says, "Just what I need, a college boy. Just don't let your college degree get you killed." Harry is a non-college graduate and has probably worked his way up in the force. Harry is a man who has learned to survive. In his kind of work there are things that no college diploma or any kind of training could teach to keep him alive. Harry lives by his self-taught wits and gut emotion.

After the capture of Scorpio when Harry is called to the D.A.'s office Harry stares stupidly when asked if the famous case of Miranda rings a bell. And earlier, at the stadium, when "Fatso" DeGeorgio (John Mitchum) mentions something about a warrant to Harry, Harry completely ignores technicalities. Harry survives best the way he lives, that's the point. He has no need for formal education. The viewer is sucked under by this tricky manipulation of an anti-intellectual (and ultimately, anti-liberal) case that the film presents.

"Straw Dogs" is diametrically opposite in this. The title is said to be taken from Lao-tse: "Heaven and earth are ruthless and treats the myriad creatures as straw dogs; the sage is ruthless and treats the people as straw dogs." The sage, of course, is David Sumner, a scientific, reasoning mind. He cannot live by gut emotions. His scientific, mental coolness helps let David survive just as Harry's viseral imperturbability helps him to survive. It is these two coolnesses that the viewer so readily identifies with.

"Straw Dogs" and "Dirty Harry" work on the viewer from the perspective of the quote that I used by Lao-tse. Those people who are ruthless have a greatpower in them, a god-like power of life and death. The viewer is enthralled by the portrayal of this power. In this power somebow there is the ultimate in masculinity. These two films, then, laud ruthlessness and violence while raising up and deifying the strong-man.

Hoffman: cowardly hero

A Classic American Film

By BOB NESTI

The Last Picture Show written for the screen by Larry McMurtry and Peter Bogdanovich; from the novel by Larry McMurtry; directed by Peter Bogdanovich; starring Timothy Bottoms, Jeff Bridges, Cybil Shepherd, Ellen Burstyn, Cloris Leachman, and Eileen Brennan.

The Last Picture Show is a remarkably sustained portrait of a young man's coming of age in a desolate Texan town during the early Fifties. The film is simply the finest American drama in recent memory; a carefully drawn, powerfully told, superlatively acted example of film as a storyteller. A completely cinematic work (in many ways superior to the novel from which it is adapted), The Last Picture Show evokes the color and mood of the Fifties with uncommon clarity as it makes achingly real the often disheartening experience of growing up.

Anarene Texas is a town "where a person can't sneeze without someone offering him a handkerchief." It is a small, ugly, provinciality where lives interconnect and everyone' business is known by everyone else. In many ways the town is the film's major protagonist as it wrenches life from its diverse range of inhabitants who share a common bondage of discontent. The film focuses on a number of adolescents burgeoning on maturity in a stifling, ignorant, vacant atmosphere. The main character is a young man named Sonny Crawford, a high school senior and captain of the town's football team. He is first seen breaking off with his steady girl, a plumpish, gum-chewing wench, following their usual Saturday night necking in the back of the town picture show. The relationship didn't mean much to Sonny as he would fantasize over the visual image of Elizabeth Taylor on the picture screen as he kissed his girl. His true affection though was for Jacy Farrow (Cybill Shepherd), the town's prettiest and richest girl, and the girl of his best friend, Duane Jackson (Jeff Bridges). The narrative very straightforwardly tells how these characters lives intertwine over a little more than a year's time. Sonny and Jacy seem immediately detached attempting to articulate feelings without knowing how, while Duane seems conplacent to eventually marry Jacy and settle in Anarene.

They seem parentless, rootless. We only receive momentary glimpses of Sonnie's father and Duane's mother, and Jacy all but ignores the home truths of her earthy mother. The closest any of them come to a parent figure is Sam the Lion (Ben Johnson), the owner of the town pool hall, general store, and picture show. Sam is the life force of the town, a strong, honest, and humble man whose mystique was hard to define but whose mark was left on those he touched. His character offers the only hope for Sonny and the other questioning their identity in this dead atmosphere. Typically enough they begin to wander. Sonnie has an affair with Ruth Popper (Cloris Leachman), the middle-aged, spinster-like wife of Sonnie's gym teacher. Jacy breaks away from Duane for the attention of the rich boys in an adjoining city only using him as a means to lose her virginity. Duane becomes locked in the memory of the girl and tries to escape the town. Jacy and Sonnie go together causing him to break off his secure affair with Ruth and making him aware of the uncertainties and harsh realities of his life. As the film moves to its powerful climax, Sonnie seems more detached and unsure, finally resigning himself to the ignorance and aridness of Aranene.

The Last Picture Show may seem specifically concerned with human sexuality, and its very ordinary nature has never been more accurately portrayed in an American film, but this preoccupation seems elusive after leaving the film. It is not so much about sexual awareness as about human awareness and Sonnie's final resignation seems the only conscious act he ever makes. Throughout, he, Jacy, and Duane feel alien forces that are difficult to deal with and finally resolve them on acquiescing to their desolute situation. The film is one of searing humanity, which moves on its own inherent dramatic values and not by exploiting the audience's weakness for cheap sentiment. Summer of '42 was similar in plot and theme, but The Last Picture Show makes the flaws of that otherwise decent film glare. This is a neoclasicist work, a film of the times it depicts. There is an irony in the film success for the old-fashioned, straight forward narrative technique, the flat black and white image, and the simple, day harshly played though car and home radios. Each detail is conscious and The Last Picture Show is Bogdanovich's picture; the only other work which seems as controlled as this film is Welles' Citizen Kane, and as in that film, the direction nearly eliminates any basic faults.

Timothy Bottoms and Cloris Leachman

horizontal camera work are a refreshing change from the overused flashy technique of that and many recent films. Much of the success belongs to the director Peter Bogdanovich who understands the intrinsic power of the visual image and utilizes it in a work of intricate design. Each element works towards the cohesive whole. The flat black and white photography is immediately striking as to frame the film in the viewer's mind as being part of a particular time and place and underlines the general bleakness in theme. Filing in black and white seems the most crucial decision Bogdanovich made and his gamble paid off perfectly for it seems endemic to the color of the early Fifties. The realism is also highly effective in creating the mood. Bogdanovich has lovingly recreated a particular time and place through an unpeccable concern for detail. He uses the popular items and fads of the time as motifs, the Mickey Spillance novel the high school students sneak around the room, the wide-spindled RCA victrola playing Jo Stafford, Jacy's mother's Cadillac, all evoke this particular time. The ingenious soundtrack further accentuates the setting as it parallels the plot line with the popular songs of the

The film is a first-rate adaptation of a second-rate fiction, yet many of the best films ever made come from novels that were, at best, only entertaining. Of recent films Rosemary's Baby comes to mind as both films are near literal adaptations of popular fiction that are far more important cinematic works that they ever were literary works. The novel itself has the meldramatic excesses many novels dealing with small towns suffer from and here is where Bogdanovich firm control becomes a major virtue. He has toned down the sensationalism inherent in the material, what we see is flat, honest, and stunningly told. The sense of loss flows naturally from the material and, although characters and situations may resemble cliches, the film steers clear of the ordinary, despite the ordinariness of the character's lives.

The film moves from realization of a monotony to a final victory over the citizenry's lives. The town is just as much about a way of life than about the people it portrays. It is an American study of loneliness specifically placed in a time when innocence was beginning to tarnish. The Post War Years of American supremacy were waning, the Korean War was rearing its ugly head, television was insulating Americans from the previous escapists art forms they had reveled in and finally, from each other. The film is particularly American, not only in design but in theme. The character of Sonny contains an innocence which far outweighs his general ignorance and provinciality. Jacy is more a victim of what she is told and his final resolution is more tragic than pathetic. The film grips from within as the film slowly spirals from a genuine naivete to a cold reality.

The first sign of complete resignation comes with the death of Sam the Lion. He is the film's primary life force. The only times the characters seemed to have lived is when they came in contact with him. In a beautifully restrained sequence he movingly tells Sonnie of how he once rode horses with a young married girl he loved as they sit beside the lake. The scene is especially memorable for the subtle employment of natural lighting which moves from shadows to bright sun with a rythmic grace. The theme of complete desolution is further accented when the picture show closes down. The movies were nearly killed with the emergence of television and the picture show's closing is symbolically the climax of the film, although its closing seems a minor incident. The picture show was for Sonnie and the other adolescents the romance, was the adventure, was the only excitement they seemed to ever had had. When Sonnie necks with the fat and homely Charlene Dobbs, he secretly and longingly watches Elizabeth Taylor on the screen. When the picture show closes down, the sparks of life created by John Wayne are replaced by the cathode image of Imogene Coca and the hopelessness is complete.

Bogdanovich elicits some extraordinary performances by a cast of virtually unknowns. Timothy Bottoms is perfectly naive and confused as Sonnie, he seems at times like Ryan O'Neal without the sheen. Cybill Shepherd as Jacy is the most evocative of the Fifties as the Gloria Grahame ingenue who's four parts unattainity and six parts deceit. Her earthy, bitchy mother Ellen Burstyn reminds one of Dorothy Malone and along with Ben Johnson as Som the Lion give two of the most moving performances in recent films. The most difficult to bear performance, although it is an excellent portrayal, is Cloris Leachman's Ruth, the lonely wife of the gym teacher. Her character seems too pathetic, too close to a glossy harshness to be completely effective. In some ways her character is an enigma. There are certain points about it that are purposively left undefined and she comes off the most ambiguous. In the end she seems to rather have adored Sonnie than loved him and fits unconfortably in the flat ugliness of the rest of the town. Nearly every other performance is memorable in probably the finest acted film of this past year.

The Last Picture Show hasn't one quality that would distinguish it above the ordinary. It is the second film of the director, the novel wasn't quite the stuff a film classic is made of, the actors are virtually unknown, in the days of a flashy technique it is smoothly filmed in blunt black and white, and tells a story about the boredom of people's lives. It is though the most memorable film presently in the area and to come from a major studio since Dr. Strangelove. A work of power, a work of sustained control and brilliance, The Last Picture Show proves melodrama can be art and is a classic American film.

Diamonds Aren't Forever

By MARY LOU GORDON

Sean Connery has finally returned as the inimitable James Bond after his last performance four years ago in You Only Live Twice, but his new movie, Diamonds are Forever, is a poorly contrived and greatly overworked attempt at resurrecting a hero whose place in time should have been left as it was already secured. Diamonds are Forever is a very poor movie, ridiculous at it's best. It is a good example of the abominations that can result when the movie industry tries just a little too hard to produce a powerhouse of excitement and intrigue, mixed with a great deal of social commentary.

The old James Bond has been put into a highly modernized world of astonishing tricks and ingenious devices, some of which are worthy of notice, others simply ludicrous, that seem to defy even the ability of Bond himself. Somehow the awe-inspiring marvel of the 60's doesn't quite make it in the 70's, and where he was once cool, the suave and dashing superman plods along with the same stagnant personality that he had years ago. James Bond has suddenly become pretty hard to take, and for all the modernizing the plot and Bond's clever little devices have undergone, his character seems to be lacking quite a bit of the dazzle necessary to be the type of hero Bond is supposed to be, and this lack of re-definition produces an obvious clash of effects.

Bond's world is still comprised of glamorous females swooning at his very existence, but there has been an attempt made to raise them from the level of the passively seductive female to that of head-strong, seductive bitches who are supposed to stand as his mental equals. But they come across as no more than fated victims of his emeshing dash and appeal; and ironically enough, even at his seductive best, James Bond is still romantically stiff and pretentious. He lacks the vitality that should be present in such a sexual dynamo, and his image as a lover is too outdated to make the attractions of these women seem believable. The all-time male chauvinist has been softened just a little, but no where near enough to make his ego-trip acceptable.

The basic plot of the movie has some merit to it, though the way in which it is handled leaves much to be desired. The satirical cleverness that could have been granted to this scheme has been blown out of proportion until it comes across as the summation of wild imaginations trying to reach the peak of creative madness. The level of corniness in this movie makes it obnoxious, where the desired effect should have been at least stabbingly comical.

Diamonds are Forever begins plainly enough with a fortune in stolen diamonds that Bond has to recover. By assuming the identity of the oppositions transport agent. Peter Franks, Bond dupes the volumptious Tiffany Case into believing he is Franks. He gets the diamonds, transports them out of the country in the body of the dead Franks and recovers them later in a funeral home inside an innocent looking crematory jar. However, as this is all too simple, Bond loses the diamonds to the enemy, who turns out to be his old aquaintance Blofeld. Blofeld has taken over the multi-million dollar missile research operations of one Willard Whyte and secluded in the privacy of Whyte's penthouse apartment, he succeeds in convincing all of Whyte's top men (via telephone and a voice box) that he is the reclusive Whyte, kidnapped by Blofeld and safely locked away. Bond of course discovers Blofeld's little guise, and with his life in ultimate peril, succeeds in exposing Blofeld's plot of sending the diamonds into space in a satellite which through a powerful laser beam controlled from Blofeld's center of operations in the Pacific is programmed to destroy all of the military strongholds of the world. Blofeld is stopped before his final moments of glory by Bond's intervention, and together with the strategic air command succeeds in destroying the entire set-up. The diamonds are not immediately recovered, but the inevitability of that is secure as the movie ends with a typical Bondian bedroom scene aboard a lush ocean liner with his prize, Tiffany Case.

The high-powered action that runs all through the movie is accomplished with the air of being nothing more than glamorous play for Bonds, but it is carried to the furthest point of absurdity. In his precisely cool and non-chalante manner. Bond succeeds in a timely escape from a coffin where he is about to be burned alive: escapes from his enemies by a wild chase through the deserts of Nevada in a lunar spacecrawler: eludes and makes fools of what seems to be the entire Las Vegas police force after a wild auto chase scene through the street and subsequent parking lots. Here he finally makes his grand exit from a dead end alleyway by shifting weight and cruising smoothly between two buildings, tipped precariously on two side wheels of his car. Following this is an escape from an underground tunnel system, where his captors think they have him buried alive, and then he later proceeds to scale the Whyte House Apartment building jangling periously before entering. He proceeds to fight off two female karate experts, and finishes performing a feat of walking on cables under Blofeld's oil rigging.

There is too much of an attempt in this movie to develop a good piece of biting satire in the form of total absurdisms through pugging at the wide open areas of sexism, police stupidity and undercover work in general, but these are such over-worked subjects that the spoofs are hardly enjoyable. Imagination has been totally let loose in this movie, but the thoughts and commentaries behind the actions are too feeble to uphold the intentions, and the movie, for the most part, falls short of being entertaining. The film is blatant to the point where one begins to wonder if the script writers had granted any degree of intelligence to the audiences. The intent of sophistication is here, but the end result is a display of low humor at it's worst, with puns and punchlines that would make any moron sigh at their very stupidity.

The re-appearance of James Bond, at least from the indications in this movie, seems to be a big mistake; the hero of the 60's has outdone himself in an era of technology with gimics that would make Nancy Drew cringe and shake her head with amused distain. Diamonds are Forever is a sham of ostentatious fantasy that subsists in being just that.

The UMass Speech Department Film Study Series continues its 8th season with a series of outstanding films this semester

All screenings are in Thompson 104 at 7 and 9 PM on Sunday evenings. Season subscriptions are $5.00 and will be on sale at the door. Single tickets (75¢) will also be available.

February 13

"The Woman in the Moon" (1929) Fritz Lang ("M") directed this fantasy about a group of men and a girl who travel to the moon in a rocketship. The film has been noted for its especially imaginative sets and is of special historical interest

A special program is offered featuring a lecture by Vladmir Petric, Professor of Film at Belgrade University who is in this country studying comparative systems of film. Professor Petric will show the Russian documentary "Turksib (1929) directed by Victor Turin, in addition to the Odessa Steps sequence from Eisenstein's "Potemkin (1925)

"Twentieth Century" (1934) The series shifts to a lighter mood with this 30's "screwball" comedy directed by Howard Hawks and starring John Barrymore and Carol Lombard. Andrew Sarris listed "Twentieth Century" as the best film of 1934. Like other "screwball" comedies of the time, this film is built on wisecracks, nasty and brutal dialog, and outraigeous characterizations. However, Hawks' direction places this film ahead of its time. Pauline Kael says, "Hawks represents the American commercial film at its best-fast, unpretentious, entertaining, with a sophisticated and hardboiled attitude toward sex and money."

"Yankee Doodle Dandy" (1942) Staying with the lighter mood, the series' next film is a war-time musical directed by Michael Curtiz and starring James Cagney, Cagney, as George M. Cohan, won an Oscar and a New York Film Critics Award. The film is an undisguised attempt at building national sentiment for the war effort. Songs included are "Over There", "Give My Regards to Broadway," and "You're a Grand Old Flag." Time magazine said it was "Possibly, the most genial screen biography ever made."

The series presents another different program with an evening of four award-winning documentaries interespersed with selected television commercials. "Skater Dater" is a charming story of conflict and love among pre-teen boys and girls. It was featured on ABC—TV several years ago. "Weapons of Gordon Parks" is directed by Warren Forma and focuses on the multi-talented Parks in a moving documentary of dynamic creative force. "Lament of the Reservation" was filmed on location by the BBC—TV on location in South Dakota. The film exposes the Indian's experience in America through the BIA, roadside tourist stops, VISTA programs, and the ralities of existence which tourists never see. "Ai" is by Yojo Kuri, one of the world's leading antimators who sees the man woman relationship as a bitter struggle in which man is the underdog.

April 9

"Miss Julie" (1950) Overshadowed by the work of Ingamr Bergman are the films of another Swedish director, Alf Sjoberg, "Miss Julie" is considered Sjoberg's masterpiece. Based on Strindberg's play, Sjoberg fashioned a screenplay that without losing the essentials of Strindberg's writing, enlarged skillfully on its theme and freed it form the single set of the kitchen. Forsyth Hardy stated tha, "Miss Julie" can be regarded as the outstanding achievement of the Swedish film revival." The acting of the principas isflawless and the film contains some of the most beautiful camera work ever done.

April 23

"Paths of Glory" (1957) Stanley Kubrick's film explodes with a barrage of realism. Kubrick, whose subsequent cinematic views on war where savegly satirized ambitions of the French commanding general. Forced to retreat, the army is disgraced and three soldiers are tried and executed for cowardice as scapegoats for official blundering. Starring Kirk Douglas and Adolphe Menjou, the films' impact is underscored by the fact that it is still banned in France today.

April 30

"A Summer to Remember" (1960) The Russian film had a strong rebirth in the early sixties with such films as "Quiet Flows the Don" and "Cranes are Flying." "A Summer to Remember" is one of the best of this period of renewed humanism. Bosley Crowther called it "a film about a child and its parents that is one of the best of the sort we've ever seen." Paul V. Beckley writes, "With "A Summer to Remember" a couple of young Russian directors (Georgy Dabella and Igor Talankin) go a long way toward reinstating the supremacy of the camera in a telling series of shots of a small childs view of the world around him."

Mary 7

"Repulsion" (1966) The series' last film retains an Eastern European flavor with Roman Polanski's "Repulsion." Starring Catherine Deneuve, this is the story of a girl tormented by her craving and loathing of men. Her fears and erotic fantasies drive her beyond the edge of sanity. Dwight McDonald calls the film "the purist exercise in homicidal mania yet made." He compares portions of the film to Bergman's "The Silence" and von Stronheim's "Greed", yet the film is pure Polanski - a depressingly macabre story similar in tone to his prize-winning "Knife in the Water" and his later work "Rosemary's Baby."

Made For Each Other (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)

The people who made Lovers and Other Strangers have returned with a genuinely likeable comedy about two people leading decidely separate lives and decide to live together. Their romance is stormy, but watching this couple, delightfully portrayed by the film's authors Renee Taylor and Joseph Bolgna, makes for a joyful film.

nedy,Jimmy Finlayson, Tiny Santoru, and Max Davidson.

The Last Picture Show (Palace Cinema, West Springfield)

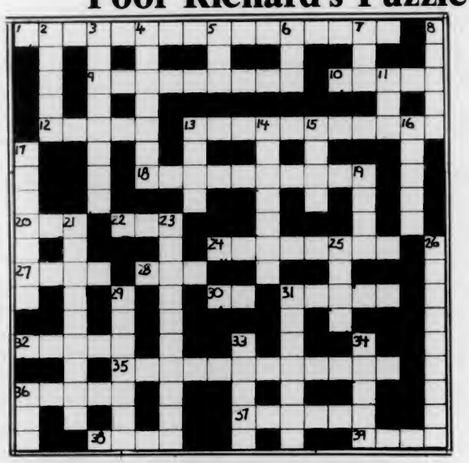
The Best American Film of last year is this depressing, bleak vision of life about the coming of age of three youngsters in a small Texas town in 1951. Directed by Peter Bogdanovich, the film is a straightforward well-crafted, well-acted narrative about the perils of growing up in the finest tradition of the great Hollywood directors. The film is nostalgia in the negative sense and despite some near melodramatic plotting is the most poignant film in quite some time. The acting is superb by a cast of mostly unknown character actors led by Cloris Leachmen, Timothy Bottoms, Jeff Bridges, Eileen Brennan, and Ben Johnson. The film won four NY Film Critics awards and finished second in voting for Best Picture behind a Clockwork Orange; an often searing film.

Straw Dogs (campus Cinemas, Hadley)

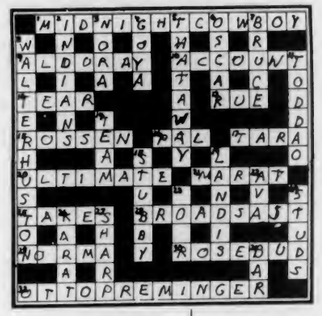
Sam Peckinpah's essay on violence finally becomes a celebration of some sick behavior.Dustin Hoffman plays an American mathametician who runs from the violence of his homeland toe provinciality of his English wife's country town. He can't escape the gore and Peckinpah revels in it in a climax of unrelenting brutality Beyond the various forms of murder, there isn't much here. The film's principal virtue is the performance of Susan George as the nasty bitch Hoffman marries, otherwise, a bleak, strident film.

Such Good Friends (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)

A savagely tasteless comic melodrama about a woman who, while her husband lies dying, discovers he had numerous affairs with many of her friends. The humor often comes through gross justopostion or plain rank fun; still under the unusually slick hand of Otto Preminger and a fine screenplay by Elaine May (using a pseudonym), the film often is good, dirty fun. The digs are many, from hypocritical chicness to medical malpractice and done with slapstick flair by a large cast led by Dyan Cannon, Laurence Luckinbell, and James Coco.



The Treasure of the Sierra Madre (Jerry Lewis Cinemas, Northampton)



A sombre and gripping saga about some dispicable thieves' search for god which is considered by many the best sound film of the Forties. Today the praise seems a bit overwrought, still an excellent adult adventure film from the Forties. Oscars went to both John Huston, who directed and his father Walter in the best portrayal as the oldest of the rascals. Humphrey Bogart plays one of the other bandits.

Edward Albee's play about some intelligent, witty, and quite desperately lonely people. The theme is serious but the play often is humorous. Tonight, tomorrow, and Sunday evening at Theater 14, Smith College. ($)

The Ridiculous Theatrical Company
This off-off Broadway company will perform the Americanupremiere of "The Eunuchs of the Forbiddin City" this evening and tomorrow evening at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. These Eunichs, according the Berlin Reich "play their lustful games this time in the palace of the Chinese Emperor." He desperately wants a child and when he finally succeeds in impregnating a young woman, the child turns out to be an idiot. The play of the intrigants is full of fabulous parodies, of consciously chosen cliches and well-known stereotyped proverbs and lines which are related to the local area (from "Currywurst"uto "Chicken-Hugo"). Charles Ludlam, the fabulous bluebeard and head of the group, has his beard woven in Chinese braids, and his extraordinary performers play alternately roles of ladies, gentlemen and in-between-types. A fantastic parody with satirical background which nobody should miss. ($)

The Fantastics
The off-broadway musical legend opened in 1961 at the Sullivan Square Theatre and is still occupying its stage. This National Company of this delightful, touching, six-character show makes for wonderful entertainment. The score and libretto are by Tom Jones and Harvey Shmidt and include such songs as "Try To Remember", "Soon It's Gonna Raine", and "I Can see It." The thin plot concerns the romance of a boy and girl and the well-intended interference of each of their fathers. In its own small way a classic American Music Sunday afternoon and evening 2:30 and 8:30 in Bowker Auditorium.

CABARET
The weekly excursion in the musical theater as performed by the Lion's Share company in the Blue Wall every saturday evening at 8:30 and 10:30 this time around presents the music and lyrics of John Lennon and Paul McCartney. The company performs well enough, the surroundings are pleasant. And the sound system quite good. Liquor is served for those who are eligible, otherwise soft drinks and pizza etc.

The Collector (Sat., Bowker Auditorium, Mt. Holyoke College, 8)
An engrossing, often compelling, two-character thriller about a young man who moves from collecting insects to capturing a young woman and keeping her captive in an old house. Directed by William Wyler from the novel of John Fowles, the film is a splendid highly polished psychological drama with two extraordinary performances by Terence Stamp and Samantha Eggar.

Diamonds Are Forever (Campus center, Hadley, Academy of Music, Northampton
Bondius back, or so the ads tell us; but this latest adaptation of one of the many Ian Fleming novels is a ruther undistinguished facsimile. The film lacks the style and humor which made the earlier films the best of the Sixties spy films' it isn't even good James Bond with Sean Connery looking too paunchy and old for 007. This film does have the distinction of being the quickest grossing films in history having made over $30 million dollars, only proving the Bond fad hardly has diminished since the heyday of Goldfinger. For more, see review on Page 14 of Poor Richard.

Dirty Harry (Showcase Cinema, West Springfield)
Detective Comics in Panavision with Clint Eastwood as a San Franciscan counterpart to crime-fighting the superhero comit strip characters. A shrewd, taut, well-made thriller that pits Eastwood as Dirty Harry against insane murderer named Scorpio. Harry is something to be seen as he single-handedly quenches a bank robbery without even sweating and Scorpio often does Harry one better in this sharp fantasy thriller. It has a simplistic about liberals and their mealy-mouthed ways which is all but glossed over under the firm, ingenious hand of Don Seigel.

the American version of this satire received. It is generally considered not his best work, especially with the needless cuts. The film is an often grisly black satire about vampires directed with the usual claustophobic style Polanski's films are distinguished with. If the original cuts have been restored, the film will prove effective satire, otherwise the holes are apparent. The only decent part Polanski's late wife Sharon Tate ever received.

42nd Street (Friday, Merrill Science Center, 7:30 and 10)
The plot goes as follows: the star of a Broadway show, played by Bebe Daniels is town between her love for boyfriend George Brent) and her career. Her broken leg in a pre-Broadway tryout solves her problems, but now leaves the director (Warner Baxter) in a bind. The overture's about to start all that he can do is to give the part to little Ruby Keeller right out of the chorus line and hope for the best. Will she be the toast of New York dazzling them with the brand new finale Busby Berkeley pulled out of nowhere? No matter as this early Thirties musical completely revolutionalized the idiom thanks to one man, Busby Berkeley and his hundreds of tap dancing dames that swept the depression blues away with a song. The choreographed effects are a wonder. Ginger Rogers and Bebe Daniels have some great lines. Ruby Keeler and Dick Powell have some unintentionally funny ones, and the film itself is legendary.

Fiddler on the Roof (Wednesday, Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)
A mundane version of the longest running musical in Broadway history. The disappointing epic comes away by director Norman Jewison who has employed needless flashy techniques in the transition. The musical becomes bottom-heavy and static when blown up on a Super Panavision screen and blasted out of twelve stereo speakers. The show itself has grace, charm, and a natural warmth that are all but eliminated here. Instead every moment reeks with phony folklines and cornball routines. The excellent Bock-Harnick score has been homogenized in musical interludes embarrassing at best, even Topol, generally considered the best of the stage Tevye's, becomes a glaring caricature of a poor, Russian peasant. An overrated, ill-conceived, charmless musical; with Norma Crane as the dutiful Goldie, and Molly Picon as Yente the Matchmaker.

The French Connection (Campus Cunemas, Hadley)
A fact-based account of how police track down a shipmentuof heroin in New York City which is a fast, flashy, and fascinating thriller. The grittiness and chaos of New york City is captured at breaknekk speed and brutality by director William Friedkin who has fashioned perhaps the stylish and finest thriller in some time. Gene Hackman plays a boorish detective who, as the antisocial, antihuman, detective, somewhere between Bullitt and Joe, the latest film cliche.

The Hospital (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)
The world of the big city hospital is grimly satirized in this comedy-drama that knocks home some truths about theumedical profession. Written with wit by Paddy Chayefsky the film jumps from being harsh to hilarious in its study of a middle-aged doctor deteriorating at the end of a bad marriage. The performance of George C. Scott is, to say the least, strong as he once again proves he is the best living American actor in films. Diana Rigg is featured

House of Wax (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)
Originally released in 1954 as one of the first three-dimensional films, this little macabre drama about the revenge of a mad was museum curator is a cut above the average. Never mind its coming on a bit too heavy, enjoy the three-dimensional effects (which include many perspective shots and one unnecessarily prolonged sequence when a barker bangs his paddle ball down your throat.) Vincent Price is appropriately diabolical as the vengeance-seeking madman.

Johnny Got His Gun (Amherst Cinema, Amherst)
Dalton Trumbo has filmed his National Book Award winking anti-war novel about a World War One soldier left armless, legless, speechless, and partially faceless by the war. The film is occasionally awkward, with confusing flashbacks and fantasies, but often powerful and stark anti-war film. Despite its faults, an honest and painful experience with Timothy Bottoms, Jason Robards, Marsha Hunt, and Diuna Varsi.

Key Largo (Wednesday, Jerry Lewis Cinemas, Northampton)
Bacall, Bogart, Barrymore and Edward G. Robinson in this preachy, pretentious melodrama about gangsters hiding out in a remote Florida hotel. The intention, it seemed was to say something about Post World War II conditions and it does somewhat resemble its prototype The Petrified Forest. Still well worth seeing for the performances of Robinson as the relentless baddie, Bogart as the good but ineffective hero, and Lauren Bacall, Lionel Barrymore, and Claire Trevor (who won an Oscar in a supporting role). Directed and co-authored with Richard Brooks by John Huston.

Dye Calls JOE Success Despite Problems

By BARRY STAVRO

Larry Dye, coordinator of the JOE program at UMass, summed up the four week effort as being "extremely successful."

When the national penal system has a 75% return rate of its inmates after their release, Dye reasoned, any improvement is necessary and worthwhile. Dye said, "These kids have been damaged by institutions. If we lock up a kid for four years we owe him four mistakes. My approach is to make shifts in the social system so that they serve the offender." When asked for a prediction on the JOE kids Dye answered, "We're shooting for 60% successful."

However the residents of Grayson, which housed some of the JOE kids, were not generally favorable of JOE. Charles Burns, one of the Heads of Residence stated, "The idea behind the program is good, but the logistics and administration is about the worst I've ever seen. I understand it had to be set up quickly (JOE Program) but the students of this university were imposed upon."

Dye admitted that the JOE kids had to make "a rough transition" from penal institutions to the "unfamiliar environment" of a college campus. In discussing the theft problem on campus during the JOE program Dye said, "There can be a few incidents directly related to the JOE kids." He continued, "Realistically though, you have to expect that when you're taking a hundred kids."

Some common complaints in Grayson were that the residents were not asked if they wanted the JOE kids to live there, and the program wasn't explained to them beforehand. Burns said, "It was arbitrarily decided that they were going to live here."

Last week's letter to the editor, "What's up Joe?", Burns admitted was not totally correct. He said it "was sprinkled with some facts to make the Program look bad." He stressed the fact that it was the first negative response to JOE, to be printed in the Collegian.

The author of the letter, Howard Levin, stated that the purpose of the letter "was to indicate that the program, although sound in its motivation, has many problems that should be aired, in case it should ever be repeated."

Burns, who is on the Hill's security force, said that during the JOE program $200 worth of property had been stolen. A Dickinson girl had lost $75 from her wallet, a door and table were smashed, and a vending machine had been vandalized. He also said that during the program between two and six cars were broken into each night on the Hill. Burns also said that JOE kids have been seen testing door knobs. He admitted that all the thefts were not totally due to the JOE kids, but that "It's very easy to take advantage of the program." He explained that outsiders have used JOE as an excuse for visiting the dorms, and that some of the thefts occurred while the strangers were in the dorms.

Dye had said earlier about the JOE program, "We don't see ourselves as a liability. We try to live up to the commitments and obligations here, and we'd like to be aware of them." He continued that JOE was reimbursing the university and students for some of the damaged or stolen material. Concerning those who have complained about the program, Dye offered, "I feel sorry that a person can't deal with the problem heads up.That he can't come down and talk."

Burns also complained about the JOE advocates. "Some of the advocates are in worse shape than the JOE people." He cited one advocate who still has a case pending from the drug raid here last spring. Burns commented, "And he has the unmitigated gall to take care of a kid." Burns did say that "I'd like to commend those who are sincere." But he felt that some had worked in the program only for the $40 a week salary they were paid.

However, Dye felt that the student volunteers had made "One hell of a commitment." He added that "The R.S.O. office became a catalytic social agency. It's a fascinating concept that RSO can push. Pres. Wood to get the Governor to make an official statement."

One other point of debate was whether a college campus is a healthy atmosphere for delinquents. Burns believes it unwise to bring the JOE kids into an environment where "the use of drugs and alcohol is phenomenol."

Larry Dye, coordinator of the JOE program, termed the effort a success. But, according to some, the much-heralded effort had drawbacks. Residents of Orchard Hill were among those that registered complaints against the program.

Dye stated that "Universities aren't dens of inequity." He also thinks it naive to assume that a college campus would be too liberal for the JOE kids. He explained that there was a fourteen year old girl in the program who had been a prostitute on the streets for two years. He noted that most of the JOE kids had broken away from their family at age twelve. Therefore, it seemed ridiculous to him to believe that they could be negatively influenced here.

Dye summarized his feelings about the interaction between the JOE program and UMass students by saying that it should have been a "sharing experience." But he felt, "I don't think we tapped it enough."

Meany Speculates About Candidates

WASHINGTON (AP)- AFL-CIO President George Meany says he doesn't want President Nixon defeated for re-election "by somebody who is advocating surrender" in Vietnam.

Meany, a vehement critic of the President in recent months, said Sunday in a copyrighted interview in U.S. News & World Report "the chances are very slim" the AFL-CIO will support Nixon for re-election.

But when asked if he wants to see Nixon defeated, Meany replied: "It all depends on who the Democratic candidate is. I don't want to see him defeated by somebody who is advocating surrender. I don't believe in surrender. in Vietnam."

On domestic matters, Meany said, Nixon "makes good speeches but he doesn't deliver. He vetos. He talks about poverty, he talks about the elderly-every bill that comes along that would mean anything for these people, he vetos."

As for foreign policy, "I don't think we should allow ourselves to get into a box that I think Nixon is going to get himself in going to China just because of his re-election," Meany said.

"That's the only thing he can possibly get out of the visit to China, if he gets a favorable response from the people in this country. But he's not going to outsmart the Chinese, in my book," the 77-year-old labor leader added.

Meany said he liked all the potential Democratic candidates "pretty much" on their domestic records. But, he said, if Gov. George Wallace of Alabama were the nominee, "we couldn't go for him."

And he reiterated his antipathy toward Mayor John Lindsay of New York.

Meany declined to predict whether Nixon would be re-elected, but said "it's my belief that he is not nearly in as good shape as some of his people think. They think he's a shoo-in, and a lot of newspaper political experts think that. I don't think so."

Turning to the economic scene, Meany said he thinks wage and price controls will be necessary for a year or a year and a half.

He repeated charges that the Pay Board and Price Commission are controlled by the Nixon administration, but when asked if labor members will remain on the Pay Board, Meany said:

"We don't feel at this moment that there is any particular good we could gain by getting off, but the thing is not working too well."

SOS Organized To Support Belchertown Suit

A new organization with state-wide appeal has been formed at UMass in the wake of a class action suit filed against the state Department of Mental Health. The suit charges that the state has been negligent in the care of patients at the school.

The organization-Students Offering Support (SOS)-will meet tonight at 7:30 p.m. in the Student Union-Campus Center complex. The exact location of the meeting has not been determined, but may be obtained at the information booth on the main floor of the Campus Center.

SOS is a state-wide organization with headquarters at UMass. The organization will provide means of obtaining funds for the historic trial which should begin within two weeks.

It is expected that the legal cost in taking this case to court will be outstanding and that the case could possibly be drawn out by the state inorder to drain the funds of the parents directly involved in the case.

If the state wins this case it will only be because the necessary funds were not made available to the parents. It is also true that if the parents lose this case the inhumane and sterile conditions which now exist at the Belchertown School will never change.

Chairman Joe Sylvia announced that UMass Professor Ben Ricci, president of the Belchertown Friends Association and organizer of the suit against the state will speak at this first meeting and will show slides pertaining to the Belchertown School.

Commission Hits Dope Laws

NEW YORK (AP)- The New York Times reported Sunday that the National Commission on Marijuana and Drug Abuse will recommend March 22 that all criminal penalties on the private use and possession of marijuana be eliminated.

The commission chairman, former Gov. Raymond P. Shafer of Pennsylvania, declined to comment.

"I have said before that I would make no comment until the report is officially released," he said, "I think it's rather unfair to have all this speculation."

The same attitude was taken by others of the 13-member commission, nine of whom were appointed by President Nixon.

The Times siad the commission has decided use of the drug should be vitually "decriminalized" except for growing it, transporting it, smoking it in public or giving it to friends.

The report, however, said it found no beneficial aspects and will recommend against its use.

But, the commission said, its studies showed that marijuana is not addictive, cannot be shown to be physically or psychologically harmful and that its use does not appear to lead to the use of hard drugs.

Admission To Belchertown Temporarily Prohibited

The Administration Building of Belchertown State School, where a restraining court order has prohibited the acceptance of new patients.

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

(BOSTON)-A federal judge in a landmark decision behind closed doors last Friday issued a temporary restraining order which prohibits the transfer of patients to and from Belchertown State School for the retarded.

Judge J. W. Ford also ordered Peter C. Goldmark, secretary of Human Services to make a complete evaluation of the medical needs of each resident of the school and to present the results to the court within 30 days.

The class suit filed by 28 parents of residents at the Belchertown School charges that the state Department of Mental Health has been negligent in the care of patients at the school. All 28 parents are members of the Belchertown Friends Association and were represented in U.S. District Court by Attorney Beryl W. Cohen, a former state senator from Brookline.

Cohen shortly after the decision was announced, said in a press conference that it was the "most advanced court case concerning mental retardation in the United States today."

UMass Professor Benjamin A. Ricci, president of the Belchertown Friends Association and an organizer of the Court action, called Friday's action "a great beginning." The case should be brought to trial within two weeks.

Ford ordered Goldmark, Dr. Milton Greenblatt, commissioner of the Department of Mental Health of Belchertown State School to formulate a comprehensive treatment plan for all residents "which will provide adequate and proper medical, dental, educational, and nutritional services," as well as psychological, vocational and rehabilitation services.

The restraining order prohibits the admission of any person to the school until a plan for the orderly reduction of the resident population is presented to Ford. There will also be no admissions until Greenblatt and Nagle present evidence to the Court that all residents at Belchertown receive "adequate treatment and enjoy humane living conditions."

He also ordered Robert L. Yasi, commissioner of Administration, to lift a freeze on hiring. It was reported that the far-reaching decision may involve the filling of as many as 400 vacant positions at the school.

Yasi was also ordered to list the "specific needs for hygienic and other necessary supplies, equipment and repairs" at the school and to report his findings to Ford and Goldmark within 15 days.

Cohen had said early last week that the case will have "national implications" and will seek to halt the repeated violations of the constitutional rights of the patients involved, under the First, Fifth and 14th Amendments to the Constitution.

Ernest M. Haddad, chief assistant to Goldmark, said the state has not decided whether it will appeal or consent to the court orders. Greenblatt who is also an Ex Officio member of the UMass Board of Trustees could not be reached for comment on the court's decision.

The Collegian has learned from informed sources that the lawyers representing the state attempted to have the case thrown out of court but were quickly overruled by Ford. It was reported that Ford was "outraged" at the content of the suit which defines the inhumane conditions at the school. It was also learned that the number of plaintiffs-there is presently 28 parents-would be increased before the case comes to trial.

Ricci said he was elated at the Court's action. He told the MDC: "My first reaction to the Court's decision was that this is the beginning of anew day for all the mentally retarded, not only at Belchertown State School but for all of Massachusetts.

"It's just unbelievable to see justice administered so swiftly," exclaimed Ricci.

Six Positions To Be Filled On Community Relations Board

By LARRY ST. CYR AND JANET TIERNEY

The Southwest Committee on Community Relations is now accepting applications from undergraduate area residents for six positions on the newly created Southwest Community Relations Board (SCRB).

The Board needs three undergraduate residents, one administrative services representative and one office representative; also a Southwest Master's staff representative. The three undergraduate residents must include one male, one female, one black, and one non-senior. Applications are available in the Southwest Assembly Office in Coolidge Lobby. The deadline for applying is February 28th.

All applicants for the positions will be interviewed by the committee at a date yet to be announced. The appointments will be made for a period of one year, starting March 15th.

The Southwest Assembly created the SCRB on February 1st to "make Southwest a better community". The SCRB will have the status of an individual, and all the rights and privileges of a member of the Southwest community. It will act as an ombudsman and a referral agency to the Southwest Area Judiciary.

In its ombudsman role the SCRB will hear complaints or suggestions affecting personal or community welfare from any member of the Southwest community. It will respond in a community-relations fashion to these complaints or suggestions, or make appropriate referrals when the matter is best addressed elsewhere.

When a matter endangers a member of the community, or his property, the SCRB will be consulted. Appropriate cases will include the throwing of objects from dormitories (especially towers), taking screens off windows, possession of guns and other lethal weapons, fireworks and theft of University or personal property. The SCRB will not necessarily limit itself to these cases, however.

The Southwest Assembly suggests that applicants for the positions be people "who can see both sides of an issue", and are capable of responsible judgment.

Telephone Rates Up

New England Telephone Co. has recently announced rate increases which will total $65.6 million a year. They take effect immediately.

According to New England Telephone Co., the rate increases will raise basic unlimited residence service from 45 to 85 cents. One party residence service rates will be increased from 75% to $2.15 per month.

The rate increase was unsuccessfully contested by the State Consumer Council.

The reasons given for the rate increases by the Massachusetts Department of Public Utilities are that the company's financial situation is such that "it must have massive rate relief to return its earnings to a level which avoids confiscation." Other reasons for the rate increases are recent wage increases, the use of fraudulent credit cards and vandalism of telephone company property.

French Apertif Tomorrow

In an attempt to bring a little of the French culture to UMass and to open lines of communication within the department between the Faculty and the students, the French Club will be hosting an apertif for the Faculty and Majors in the French Department.

The apertif is the French equivalent of the American Cocktail Party, but connotes a time for relaxation and conversation. It affords the students with an opportunity to take some time off from their schedules, and meet and talk with their professors and their fellow students outside of the classroom.

The apertif will be held in the third floor lounge of Herter Hall, tomorrow at 11 a.m. All French Majors and Faculty are invited to attend. Refreshments will be served.

'Keys To Harmony' At Amherst

The Baha'i Association of Amherst College is sponsoring a public gathering entitled "Keys to Harmony--a Musical Introduction to the Baha'i Faith" featuring Dr. Daniel Jordan, professor in the University School of Education. The meeting will be Tuesday evening, February 15th, 8:00 P.M., in room 102 of the Amherst College Music Center.

Dr. Jordan is Director of the School of Ed's Center for the Study of Aesthetics in Education. A recipient of various music and academic awards, and with an Oxford degree in music theory, he is an able pianist and composer as well as the possessor of a doctorate in psychology, a combination of interests which finds application in his duties at the University. In the time left him after his teaching work, Dr. Jordan also serves as Vice-Chairman of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States.

"Keys to Harmony" is an example of a teaching method currently being developed by Dr. Jordan. Utilizing a thorough knowledge of theory and of musical style as it has evolved, Dr. Jordan succinctly illustrates, for example, the central idea of the Baha'i Faith, that is, the unity in and through the diversity of mankind. This technique allows the instructor to demonstrate an idea, in this case the principles of spiritual guidance found in the Baha'i Faith, simply, clearly, and, because of the method's value as just plain entertainment, in an almost unforgettable way.

The meeting is open to the public, it's free, and refreshments will be served.

Parking Help

If your present parking assignment is a hardship, you may appeal to your assignment at 103 Hampshire House beginning February 15. There are a limited number of parking spaces available. The reassignments will be made consistent with the present point sytem.

Financial Aid

Financial aid applications for the Summer of 1972 and the 1972-73 academic year are now available in the Financial Aid Office, Room 232, Whitemore.

Applications will be available from now until 5:00 P.M., Tuesday, February 29 and must be filed no later than March 1. Whether or not aid has been received previously, a new application must be filed each year for all Loans, Scholarships, Grants and Work Study.

Viet Cong Cease-Fire Ignored By U.S.

SAIGON (AP)-A Viet Cong Tet cease-fire went into effect across South Vietnam Monday, but the United States ignored it and ordered a sixth successive day of heavy air attacks. The total number of strikes soared past the 500 mark.

The Viet Cong had announced, a 96-hour cease-fire for the lunar new year celebration beginning at 1 a.m. Saigon time, 12 p.m. EST Sunday.

The allies declared their own shorter 24-hour cease-fire beginning at 6 p.m. Saigon time, Monday 5 a.m. EST Monday, claiming the Communits wanted to take advantage of the longer truce to infiltrate troops and supplies from North Vietnam into the South.

The dwindling of U.S. forces in South Vietnam, now numbering 133,000 troops, went on heightened alert and were ordered to stay out of cities and towns except for essential official business.

The U.S. Command said the added security measures were taken "in anticipation of a possible increase in enemy activity" during the Tet observance this week.

Twelve hours before the scheduled Viet Cong cease-fire was to begin, a U.S. patrol helping secure Saigon's eastern flanks clashed with enemy troops 20 miles east of the capital, pulled back and called in helicopter gunships.

There were no U.S. casualties on the ground, but the enemy troops shot down an observation helicopter trying to pinpoint positions for the gunships to attack. The pilot was killed and the copilot wounded. Six enemy were reported killed.

A second patrol operating in the same general area suffered one man wounded in a small clash, while enemy losses were not known.

While Tet actually falls on Tuesday, the celebrations last the entire week and most government offices and businesses are closed for the better part of the week.

Cease-fires for holidays in the past have been meaningless, with scores of violations reported. It was during Tet 1968 that the Communist command launched its biggest offensive of the war, while 50 per cent of South Vietnamese troops were on leave.

Informants said U.S. air strikes would continue across South Vietnam until 6 p.m. Monday, when the allied truce is scheduled to begin. They said that during the 24-hour allied cease-fire, American bombers would be diverted from targets in South Vietnam to attack enemy supply lines in Laos and Cambodia.

U.S. officials said they do not anticipate a major North Vietnamese and Viet Cong offensive until after Tet, possibly timed to President Nixon's visit to Communist China beginning next Monday. In the meantime, intensified rocket, mortar, sapper and terror attacks are expected.

The U.S. Command reported that Air Force and Navy tactical fighter-bombers flew 162 strikes against enemy supply lines and staging areas during the 24-hour period ending at dawn Sunday.

In Cambodia, the high command reported a series of clashes and harassing attacks on the southern edges of the Angkor Wat and Angkor Thom temple areas Saturday. One Cambodia soldier was killed and nine were wounded in fights centering around an airfield for the former tourist center of Siem Reap and a road from the air field to Siem Reap, four miles south of the temple area, the command said.

The region is held by the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong and there has been talk in Phnom Penh that the enemy wants to install Prince Norodom Sihaneuk, Cambodia's exiled ruler, as the head of the rival government there. The present regime in Phnom Penh does not want that to happen and is reported ready to attack in an effort to drive the enemy out.

In Vientiane, officials announced that Laotian government troops reentered the town of Muong Kasy Sunday after pushing several Pathet Lao battalions north from Vang Vieng. The officials declined to say if the town 88 miles north of Vientiane, was "recaptured" by the government troops. The town fell to the Pathet Lao a week ago

4,000 Irish Attend Rally

ENNISKILLEN, Northern Ireland (AP)-A rally of 4,000 Roman Catholics called Sunday for an end to preventive detention of guerrilla suspects in Northern Ireland and for abolition of the province's Protestant-dominated parliament.

The demonstrators also demanded the withdrawal of British troops and speakers rejected a compromise solution which the British government is reported ready to offer.

The rally assembled after a short march through this resort town among County Fermanagh's lakes. The march took place in defiance of a government parade ban and security measures backed up troops and police.

An estimated 10,000 protesters rallied in Dublin. They were addressed by leaders of the Irish Republican Army including Joe Cahill and Sean MacStiofan. Both demonstrations passed without incidents.

At the Enniskillen gathering, speakers dismissed any suggestions that Catholics should be represented in the Northern Ireland cabinet.

A Catholic role in the cabinet and a Catholic deputy prime minister are among proposals reportedly under consideration by Prime Minister Edward Heath of Britain in an attempt to bring Northern Ireland's 500,000 Catholic minority back into political communion with the province's million Protestants.

Catholic opposition lawmakers in the provincial parliament are boycotting the legislature in a policy of noncooperation with the Protestant based government.

Kevin Agnew, vice president of the Catholic-based Civil Rights Association, said it was unlikely that prominent Catholic politicians would enter the cabinet.

"They want to enjoy a few more summers," he added.

This was understood by the crowd to mean that a Catholic in the cabinet might risk assassination from IRA gunmen who are waging a guerrilla war to unite the predominantly Protestant North with the mainly Catholic Irish republic.

Bernadette Devlin, the 24-year-old leftist member of the British Parliament from Northern Ireland, called on the crowd to support men on the run from security forces with accommodations and money.

The tone of the speakers seemed to bode ill for any new British united under the republic. There has been speculation that the British government is about to come up with such proposals.

In Brief...

Meany Accuses White House Of Behind Scenes Manipulation

NEW YORK (AP)-George Meany said Sunday he has a copy of a telephone memorandum showing that the "White House gang" deliberately tried to create a hostile reception for President Nixon when he addressed the AFL—CIO convention last Nov. 19 in order to create public sympathy for him.

"Somebody leaked it?" Mike Wallace on the CBS-TV program "60 Minutes" asked of the memorandum.

"Leaked it?" Meany replied. "They delivered it."

Hoffa Considers Nixon Best Candidate

But the statement, Hoffa insisted, should not be interpreted as an endorsement.

GM Calls Post-Dispatch Story "Purely Speculative"

DETROIT (AP)-General Motors Corp. spokesmen described as "purely a speculative story" a St. Louis Post-Dispatch report Sunday that the firm will spend "far less than the $35 million that has been estimated" it would cost GM in the largest automotive recall in history.

"It's purely a speculative story based on their own arithmetic and we wouldn't comment on it," a GM spokesman said.

Andre Malraux Arrives In Washington

WASHINGTON (AP)-Former French cabinet minister Andre Malraux arrived in Washington Sunday, where he will brief President Nixon on Communist China.

Malraux will be guest of honor Monday night at a White House dinner to be attended by members of the official party that will accompany Nixon on his trip to mainland China later this week.

A Valentine's Day Greeting--

To the graduate faculty of the UMass Geology Dept.

Gentlemen: —

Where will it all end and when will I get her back?

You've had your gritty, sediment-coated hands on her career for most of the last seven years.

She has earned three times the necessary minimum credit hours for the Ph.D. She's won merit badges in boat handling, jeep driving, core sampling, the fathometer and in lecturing to freshman labs.

And, Lord knows, she's plotted every wave pattern and counted every pebble on the beaches of Plymouth Bay. For brains and physical stamina she must make the average UMass Women's Libber look like a Victorian hausfrau.

So how the hell long does it take to get through your boot camp?

Wouldn't it be nice — and I'm making the proposition without her knowledge or permission — if no one asked to grade those extra papers; if some one else was asked to 'volunteer' for that next freshman field trip? Wouldn't be nice, now, if she could find time to work on her languages, her comprehensives and make a beginning on her thesis?

Maybe, with a little help, she can finish her thesis within another calendar year. Then maybe she can come home to stay. I'd like that.

Sincerely,

GORDON F. GRAY
Dayton, Ohio

P.S.: If you see Kathryn around, wish her a happy Valentine's day for me, won't you? Thanks!

Coal Strike Causing Crisis In Britain

LONDON (AP) — Thousands of families ate cold Sunday dinner in unheated homes as power cuts multipled into Britain's worst industrial crisis in 46 years and stirred opposition to Prime Minister Edward Heath's Conservative government.

The administration warned that Britain faces a total shutdown of industry by the end of the month if a five-week-old strike by coal miners continues to hamper operations at coal-fired electricity plants.

Leaders of the national Union of Mineworkers went before a government-named court of inquiry to state their case for a big pay boost.

High Court Judge Lord Wilberforce, who is heading the inquiry, said he hoped its work would be completed by the end of the week. And miners leader Lawrence Daly said satisfactory recommendations could be put to miners' union branches in two or three days.

But he warned the union might opt for a national ballot which would delay a decision on a return to work for up to three weeks.

The court's unusual Sunday meeting underscored the gravity of a situation that has put the nation's factories on half time and led to forecasts of even more power cuts.

Already supporters as well as opponents of the Conservative administration were asking why the crisis had been permitted to arise and why it was not foreseen.

Some commentators taxed Heath with attempting to impose a blanket 8 per cent ceiling on pay increases for all unions. They said the coal miners, the most tightly knit and determined group in industry, were the toughest opponent the prime minister could have selected.

The coal strike and consequent power cuts apparently contributed strongly to a skid in the popularity of both Heath and his Conservative party in the latest opinion poll published Friday. It showed 48 per cent of the sampling believed Heath was doing a bad job. Only 34 per cent approved his work.

But it was picketing more than the actual coal strike that brought the government order limiting 20,000 British industrial firms to three days' operation a week.

Three weeks ago the miners launched a campaign of picketing power stations. Truck drivers in solidarity refused to cross the lines.

This soon starved the power stations, not only of coal but also of vital chemicals used in the production of electricity.

Mrs. Average Citizen was paying the highest toll in the confrontation with the mine workers, especially if she cooked with electricity. Many thousands do in this country because it is cheaper than gas.

Some housewives met the power cuts by cooking their Sunday roast early and serving it cold. Others took a chance and were forced to serve up an underdone product.

The power cutoffs hit the nation district by district for three-or four-hour periods at a time in rotation. Most homes had no electricity for eight hours a day between 6 a.m. and midnight.

Heating was the greatest problem, although the weather was relatively mild for the season.

An estimated 80 per cent of the country's 18 million homes use electricity one way or another in their heating systems.

COAL MINERS CHASED BY POLICE--Coal miners and police charge toward Markham Colliery in the Derbyshire town of Duckmanton. A number of arrests were made after a strong force of police broke through pickets blocking the entrance of the mine to allow non-strikers inside the gates. (AP)

Anti-War March Held In Paris

VERSAILLES, France (AP) — An international antiwar assembly, one of the largest ever held, unanimously backed on Sunday Communist Vietnamese proposals for ending the Vietnam war and termed the U.S. peace plan "hypocricital and fallacious."

Then some of the 800 delegates from 80 countries-including an American contingent-braved a chill rain to march in nearby Paris behind Viet Cong and North Vietnamese flags and French Communist party banners.

The six-block long parade rang with cries of "Nixon-fascist, murderer." and "U.S. go home."

The "Paris World Assembly for Peace and Independence of Indochinese Peoples," ended a three-day meeting in Versailles by adopting without a single dissent a resolution which said, in part "the solution to the Vietnam conflict lies in the seven-point proposals of the provisional revolutionary government of South Vietnam-Viet Cong-" and two recently presented "clarifications."

The plan, supported by North Vietnam, calls for the United States to set a precise troop withdrawal date, the return of all prisoners, immediate resignation of President Nguyen Van Thieu of South Vietnam, and negotiations with the Saigon regime after it sharply alters its "warlike" policies.

The Versailles assembly was stigmatized by U.S. Ambassador William J. Porter, head of the American delegation to the Vietnam peace talks, as a "horde of Communist-controlled agitators." Because of the atmosphere created by the assembly, Porter said, he postponed indefinitely, the next session of the peace talks, which had been scheduled for next Thursday.

The United States had protested to the French government against the assembly, but the protest was rejected.

Navy Forms Military Board To Review Contracter Claims

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Navy has established an all-military board to review contractor claims after abolishing a civilian board whose chairman accused four Louisiana congress members of using undue political pressure in behalf of a shipbuilding firm.

This eliminated the job of Gordon W. Rule, the civilian official who for two years headed the Navy's Contract Claims Control and Surveillance Group which acted on claims of over $5 million.

However, Rule, who has civil service tenure, remains as director of the Navy Procurement Control and Clearance division which judges whether a company is capable of performing on a contract.

He still earns $36,000 a year.

Rule said he resigned his post of the claims board after the Navy told him they would disband it. "They made it clear to me what they were about to do, and I wasn't going to wait," he said in an interview.

The Navy denied politics had anything to do with the change and said the reason was to speed up its claims review procedures.

Although Rule resigned Nov. 12, the details became known only after the Navy issued a notice last month of its instructions to replace the Rule board with an all-military group.

Rule testified in September before the Joint Economic subcommittee headed by Sen. William Proxmire, D-Wis., that four Louisiana Democrats in Congress exercised enormous pressure on Navy officials to settle more than $73 million in claims by Avondale Shipyards of Westwego, La.

One Navy unit awarded Avondale, the largest employer in the state, $76.6 million in extra payments for costs that the company said were incurred in the production of a series of destroyer escorts.

Rule's panel held that the company was unable to satisfactorily substantiate its claim and, therefore, was not entitled to any more money. The matter is still pending.

In his testimony, Rule said the pressure to settle came from Allen J. Ellender, president pro tem of the Senate; Russell B. Long, Senate Finance Committee chairman; Hale Boggs, House majority leader; and Rep. F. Edward Hebert, Armed Services Committee chairman.

The four denied Rule's allegations and Proxmire later issued a statement saying their action appeared to be only a routine congressional request for speedier performance by the Navy.

In November Rule said he was notified by Adm. J. D. Arnold, chief of the Material Command, that his board would be disbanded.

Adm. Isaac C. Kidd, Jr., who succeeded Arnold as chief of the material Command, issued orders in January forming a new general board composed of 12 admirals to oversee command operations. One of its functions is the final disposition over all major contractor claims and to inform the assistant Navy secretary for information and logistics of its actions.

A spokesman said the change had nothing to do with the Rule board's competence.

As to the Avondale claim, the spokesman acknowledged the Navy is complying with Rule's recommendations.

"Rule said the Avondale claim was not substantiated properly and recommended steps to verify it in detail. We are complying with recommendations."

TIME Calls Hughes Book Hoax

NEW YORK (AP)-Time magazine printed parts of Clifford Irving's "Autobiography of Howard Hughes" Sunday and said they proved the book is a hoax, much of it pirated from another writer's unpublished manuscript.

The magazine also said Irving and his research assistant, Richard Suskind, had admitted that the "autobiography" was a hoax.

The Irving excerpts were published in tandem with matching passages from a manuscript by writer James Phelan, who once collaborated on a Hughes biography with long-time Hughes aide Noah Dietrich, 83. Dietrich later completed the book with another freelance writer, Bob Thomas of The Associated Press, and it is to be published this month.

Time said that in some cases the Irving and Phelan manuscript versions of Hughes anecdotes were virtually identical and sometimes they were substantially the same.

When Irving was confronted with this evidence, Time said he stated that they hadn't solved the whole mystery.

"It's more complex than you ever think," Time said the 41-year-old writer told its reporter. "You haven't seen the bottom line yet. There is going to be some big news breaking. So be careful."

Time's parent firm, Time Inc., also owns Life magazine, which had purchased magazine rights to the Irving manuscript but cancelled the arrangement after deciding the book was a hoax. Time then disclosed it would publish the excerpts in an atempt to illustrate the hoax, although it did so only after overcoming a last-minute court challenge Saturday.

Irving's likeness, painted by art forger Elmyr de Hory, the subject of Irving's previous book, "Fake," appears on the magazine cover. Irving is dubbed "Con Man of the Year" on the cover by Time, which annually names a "Man of the Year" based on impact on world affairs.

Time said Irving, whose seven earlier books never brought him fame, admitted to federal authorities that the "autobiography" is a hoax and that he never saw Hughes.

Time quoted Irving's attorney, Maurice Nessen, as saying when asked by federal prosecutors whether Irving might still try to testify that he did meet Hughes, "You won't have to call Hughes. There were no meetings with Hughes."

Time said anecdotal similarities between the two manuscripts included:

—How Hughes' scrapped plans for a steam-powered car in the 1920s.

—A New York banker was persuaded to loan Hughes $3 million after Hughes supplied him with a pornographic movie.

—The billionaire's acquisition of a private wire to bring stock market quotations to his bedside.

—A search for a 10-cent notebook, containing technical data about an aircraft, that Hughes lost.

—How Hughes' huge experimental flying boat came to be known as the "Jesus Christ" airplane.

—Hughes' instructions of what to do if he were kidnapped.

—Hughes shooting seagulls from his yacht because they were dirtying the boat.

—A contribution by Hughes to former President Harry S. Truman's 1948 election campaign.

Irving reportedly has offered to go to jail for fraud and perjury in exchange for lenience by Swiss authorities for his wife, Time said, but the Swiss balked at a deal.

While federal and county grand juries were probing the case in New York, the Swiss have asked for the extradition of Irving's wife, Edith, 36, a German-born Swiss citizen, on charges of bank fraud and passport forgery.

Irving has admitted his wife used the name "Helga R. Hughes" to bank $650,000 in checks which McGraw-Hill Inc., wrote to "H.R. Hughes" as payment to Hughes for rights to the industrialist's life story. She then withdrew the money and put part of it in another Swiss bank under another pseudonym, Swiss authorities said.

Irving has claimed publicly that Hughes ordered the banking arrangements.

Time said that when U.S. prosecutors asked the Swiss if they would reduce their charges against Edith, they offered one concession-if all $650,000 were replaced, they might let Edith plead guilty and she could get a suspended sentence.

"For the Irvings," said Time, "that amounted to no deal at all; they are believed to have spent about $100,000 of the money and authorities have been unable to account for another $100,000."

Time said it did not know Irving's motives for offering to go to jail for Edith's freedom.

"It was possible, some investigators said, that Irving hoped to ease Edith's legal burdens before she broke down and told her own side of the story, partly in anger over her husband's now famous affair with Danish singer Nina van Pallandt," the magazine said.

Mrs. van Pallandr, a 39-year-old cabaret singer who is a neighbor of the Irvings on the Spanish island of Ibiza, said she was with Irving in Mexico at a time when the writer claims he was interviewing Hughes, and that he didn't leave her sight long enough to have met Hughes.

Time said Suskind admitted through his lawyer that Irving's "baroquely detailed scenario" of meetings with Hughes was a fraud.

Suskind had sworn in a court paper that he had seen Irving with Hughes once in Palm Springs, Calif., and that Hughes had offered him an organic prune.

"In exchange for immunity for prosecution," Time said, "Suskind said he was willing to testify that contrary to his earlier affidavit, he had never seen Hughes; Hughes had never offered him that organic prune he once mentioned to lend a touch of credence to the tale."

Time said Phelan, who lives in Long Beach, Calif., brought his manuscript about Hughes to New York and showed it to McGraw-Hill and to editors of Time and Life, which had contracted for $250,000 to print excerpts of the Irving book.

Time' proposal to print side-by-side excerpts from the Irving and Pheland manuscripts was opposed in court by lawyers for Irving, McGraw-Hill and Rosemont Enterprises.

NINA Van PALLANDT leaves London, Feb. 10, to fly to New York, where she is expected to give evidence in the Mrs. Edith Irving case. (AP)

Food Services

Questionnaire Reflects Students' Complaints

By BETSY PEET AND JON SNOW

Food Services admits it has been the subject of justified criticism in the past. Contrary to the opinion of some, however, the Department has taken positive steps to react to suggestions. It has improved its programs to meet the needs of the students. University Food Services are willing to listen if there is a voice. They are even reaching out and exploring feelings and attitudes of students before the issues become crises. Shifts in policies to fewer required meals per week on the Board Plan and the initiation of Basic Foods have been just two of the major changes in the past year alone which place the University Food Services among the most advanced facilities of its kind in the country.

The Marketing Division, mentioned in last week's column, was created to act as a link between student reaction and departmental policies. It attempts to find out the desires of students and translates them into active workable programs. In creating this Marketing Division, Food Services deviated from the standard Food Service Administrative pattern. Few, if any food services, have such a specific tool to respond to student comments. It hired a complete staff of talented students to aid in policy formulation and the development of programs which affect student (Food Service) life.

These students help formulate the questionnaires that are handed out in the dining commons by Food Services and later compile the results. It takes time and a large measure of concentration to translate the responses into meaningful programs. Results are starting to show already. The expansion of Basic Foods menus to include more menu items and selection was a direct result of a survey conducted in October. Hampden Upstairs is revamped in decor...a result of comment cards and rap session gripes--translated into a program.

We students who work in the Marketing Division get frustrated when we hear general grumbling and complaining because so few people take the time or effort to comment to their Dining Commons managers or even to provide information on a specific questionnaire. Too many people just don't bother to do anything but gripe when they can do something constructive.

The challenge remains at this for those who wish to change; communicate your feelings! If you don't choose to talk with your Dining Commons manager or to write a comment card, then please, contact us, Jon and Betsy, personally or by letter, in the Marketing Division of University Food Services at Worcester Commons.

A Telethon

WASHINGTON--The Democratic Partyis seriously thinking of holding a nationwide telethon to pay off its $9 million debt. Most telethons in this country have been held for diseases such as cerebral palsy and muscular dystrophy.

The secret of raising money on a telethon is to pull on the heartstrings of the viewer. The entertainment and even the appeals of celebrities are no substitute for showing the victims of the diseases. In order to get people to phone in pledges of money, you have to pull out all stops in dramatizing the ravages of the illnesses for which you are raising funds.

I suspect that the Democrats will also have to tug at the heartstrings of the American people if their telethon is to succeed, and I can just imagine how the Democratic National Committee program will go.

Lawrence O'Brien, the Democratic national chairman, will be rolled out in a wheelchair by former President Lyndon Johnson.

"Hi there, everybody. I'm Larry O'Brien. I'm suffering from PD or political deficit, a disease that strikes every political party sooner or later. I am asking you out there in TV land to open up your hearts and your pocketbooks so we can find a cure for political deficit which has plagued America for more than 100 years.

"We're going to show you some victims of PD on our telethon. They were once healthy men with great futures ahead of them. Then they decided to run for public office, and now they are debt-ridden and scarred. Some can barely hold up their heads. Others' hands shake so much they can hardly open their mail. All these men have been afflicted by PD.

"We are asking you out there to telephone your pledge so we can lick political deficit, the greatest party killer of them all. The telephone number is JAckson 6-2000. Let's start ringing those phones right now.

"We have some wonderful people with us today. We have Paul Newman, Gregory Peck, Jane Fonda, Lauren Bacall, Margaret Truman and Peter Lawford. But before we begin our entertainment, let's talk to some of the victims of political deficit. What is your name, sir?"

"Hubert Humphrey."

"When were your first stricken by PD?"

"In 1968. I was running for President, and suddenly I started to feel sick and I got feverish and I couldn't stop talking."

"So you would like to see science find a cure for PD?"

"I certainly would. It's my only hope."

"Can we bring the mike over here to this man on the stretcher? What is your name?"

"Sen. Fred Harris. I threw my hat into the ring for 1972, and I've been flat on my back ever since."

"Ladies and gentlemen, the number to call is JAckson 6-2000. Can any of you with healthy politicians of your own turn your backs on these men? Before we hear from the cast of 'Hair,' let's talk to a few more victims of this dreaded plague. This man on crutches--your name, sir?"

"Sen. George McGovern. I've been afflicted with PD for more than a year now, and the doctors say unless I get an immediate transfusion of cash, I may not make it through the primaries."

"Ladies and gentlemen," are you going to let George McGovern drop out of the race because you failed to make a telephone call? Only you out there can save these people. The number is JAckson 6-2000.

"Let's go over to the telephones now. Here is Mary Lindsay, Mayor Lindsay's wife. Do you have any pledges, Mary?"

"Yes, Larry. The AFL-CIO has just called in, and they're donating $10 in the name of George Meany."

"God bless you, AFL-CIO. We may make our $9 million goal after all."

Life Insurance Is Needed!

(Editor's Note: This article is presented as a rebuttal to a report from Consumer's Union appearing in Thursday's Collegian. It was written by Ronald J. Nathan, President of the Pioneer Valley Association of Life Underwriters.)

By RONALD J. NATHAN

The article that appeared in last Thursday's Collegian concerning the sale of life insurance to college students was most assuredly full of misrepresentations and incomplete comparisons.

It was, very simply, an unjust attack on life insurance companies and professional life underwriters.

Consumers Union, from whom the article was copied, is an organization that earns its living by rating and ranking hairdryers, television sets, and automobiles. Consumers Union, giving a slanted opinion on the complexities of life insurance, is very much like a stockbroker advising his client on what type of washing machine to purchase.

The article was entitled "Students Don't Need Life Insurance," yet after reading the article five times I did not see where they mentioned one valid reason why a young man or woman shoud not invest in life insurance. It did state that many agents pressured students into buying, which is something that I certainly do not condone. Yet there are high pressured automobile and refrigerator salesman, however, that does not mean that you should not purchase automobiles or refrigerators.

The only other objectionable facet they really mention is the deferred payment method of starting life insurance. Of course, the student applicant for insurance does not have to defer his first year. He may very well wish to begin making premiums immediately. However, let's examine the deferred payment. The article mentions the CollegeMaster Program sold by Fidelity Union Life Insurance Company, which out of 1,800 life insurance companies is one of the 128 top rated and is the national leader in sales to college seniors and graduate students.

The article cites the example of a 21-year-old student who got a program underway by deferring his first years premium of $151. and subsequently incurred interest of $76.07 over five years. The 7% interest and $5.00 annual service charge did equal a total finance charge of 8.5%.

What the article failed to point out was that this man's deferred note was liquidated by the insurance company in the fifth year and the net cost "out of the pocket" for the entire first years coverage was only $31.27. This plan, which is only sold to college seniors and graduates offers outstanding benefits at exceptionally low rates. This man qualified at the best age rating and while in the best health and by not waiting to get started until after he graduate, he will now save at least 8% on his premiums. Every year for the rest of his life, this could be a savings of as much as $800. to $900. over his lifetime, on just one small $10,000 policy.

An 8.5% service charge is certainly not very high for an eventual savings such as that; especially when you consider that banks charge as much as 18% interest on charge card balances and 8% to 10% for new car loans. In fact, there is over an 8% service charge every time you purchase a mutual fund share from a brokerage house.

There are perhaps some small non-rated insurance companies that do have questionable financing programs operating in the South and Midwest; however, these companies do not operate in the New England States where the insurance laws are so stringent. The insurance commissioner in Connecticut recently stated that no one had ever lost a cent he invested in any life insurance company operating in that state.

Life insurance without a doubt is the most needed and valued asset that any man can have. Any financial expert will agree that life insurance must be the first step taken in building a solid financial portfolio.

With our current tax structure (life insurance proceeds are generally not taxable) and high cost of living, it takes years to accumulate an estate-yet throught life insurance your estate is created immediately. It is also important to recognize that life insurance, on the average, makes up 87% of the estate left at death.

Every young man and woman getting out of school and beginning his own financial life is faced with economic hazards for the first time. He must have available funds for emergencies and business opportunities that might arise.

He must also have disability protection so as to avoid economic disaster, and perhaps most important he must put some of his earnings away into a long-range guaranteed savings program-one that he will not draw out of unless absolutely necessary...Life insurance fulfills all of these needs.

Studies show that most college graduates are as much as $30,000 in debt by the time they are out of school five years. Who would pay these mortgage, car payments, and business debts if he should die?

Perhaps most important is the fact that todays college plans guarantee a young man or woman that by starting with one small program now, they will be able to add as much as sixty to ninety thousand dollars of coverage when, and if they want it in the future. The young person is guaranteed additional financial security in the future even if he should be in poor health, have a hazardous occupation or he is disabled. In fact, most college plans cover a man in full if he goes in the service and is killed in Vietnam.

Better Homes and Gardens states that "Every year, millions of prospective insurance buyers-and many longtime policyholders-rely on myths about life insurance. They buy (or don't buy) thousands of dollars worth of policies, using Model-T notions about insurance." With this in mind they published an article (later put in pamphlet form) entitled "The Ten Most Misunderstood facts about life insurance." The following is a very brief summary of their factual analysis of these ten misconceptions concerning life insurance:

1. Do you have to die to collect? No! Almost 60 percent of life insurance payments to policyholders while they are living. Permanent insurance plans allow policyholders to borrow from their plans, surrender the policy for cash, and to take retirement income from it. They also pay millions of dollars in disability benefiits each year.

2. Is term insurance always cheaper? No! Not unless you die quickly-and that's not likely to happen to a young man or woman. If you live, then it is certainly not cheaper.

3. Can young couples afford enough insurance at the time they need it most? Yes! There are any number of ways that young couples can get life insurance to cover their needs without making them insurance-poor.

4. Is group insurance enough? No! It is usually limited in amount and is term insurance or non-permanent protection.

5. Do you lose your policy if you miss a premium? No! There's always a one month grace period before your coverage would stop. Also, if you really got into a financial squeeze you could take a premium loan directly from the policy.

6. Are you stuck with a policy once you've bought it? No! Family and economic situations change and polices are designed to be as flexible as possible to meet these changes. It is possible to change your plan to another form of coverage with your company. However, replacement of insurance policy by another company will often result in a loss to the policyholder.

7. Does life insurance keep pace with inflation? Actually it does. When dollars lose value, not only the value of your policy is affected, but also the premiums you have to pay; the money is simply cheaper at both ends.

8. Are death benefits taxed like any other income? No! They are not subject to any federal income tax!

9. Do you have to pay interest on a policy loan? Naturally! You must pay the company a small interest charge so that they will not lose revenue by your taking out the money. This enables them to keep your policy in full force.

10. Do they put in all that fine print to confuse you? Quite to the contrary; almost every clause is put in there for the policyholders benefit. In fact, it's a one-sided contract; you can cancel it, but the insurance company cannot unless you fail to pay a premium, or if in the first two years you commit suicide or the company can prove a fraudulent misrepresentation in your application. After two years, the policy becomes incontestable.

The Better Homes and Gardens article also explains why some policies cost more than others and why some policies return more than others. You may obtain, free of charge, a reprint of this article and other general information on life insurance, by writing The Pioneer Valley Association of Life Underwriters, P.O. Box 854, Amherst, MA. 01002.

Married or unmarried, every young man and woman is faced with economic independence upon leaving school. They must begin to prepare themselves for any contingency that might occur. Life insurance is a guaranteed investment that cannot be duplicated by any other single investment or by any combination of investments. Consumers Union failed to mention that there are twenty good reasons why a college senior or graduate student should buy life insurance for every one reason that he should not buy... Life insurance is a must!

Letters To The Editor

On WMPIRG

To the Editor:

I would like to reply to the letter of Mr. Joseph Samsen and Mr. Steven Rider concerning my letter of February 10, opposing the WMPIRG fund raising scheme.

Even if I were to grant that WMPIRG is not a political organization (and I don't), I totally disagree with the methods of WMPIRG. Mr. Rider is correct in stating "...Mr. Krausman's arguments cloud the real issue. The question is whether the funding procedure is justifiable or not." Let us forget politics completely. Let us just speak of the funding procedure.

The funding procedure makes it a prerequisite for any who wishes to attend the University of Massachusetts at Amherst to lend two dollars to a "non-political" consumer research oriented group.

This "non-political" group will have privileges that no other group on campus has. WMPIRG has no clearly stated policy that it has made public. Who will be studied? Where? How? When? Who will audit their books? Students sign the petition as if they know what will happen to their money (or their father's money).

The legal question is clear:

Can a private organization force me to lend them two dollars in order to attend the state university as an undergraduate?

The argument that WMPIRG will occur undue expenses if students are not taxed is almost too silly to warrant reply. Does Mr. Rider believe students should have a legal obligation to support a private charity, if the charity can't support itself? Does he really believe a student is obligated to keep down the "processing costs" of a consumer group?

Mr. Rider believes that political groups "should all have their $2 refundable tax, IF they can convince 10,000 students to endorse it." I disagree. It is possible for the majority to pass unjust legislation. The duly elected majority voted for the Nuremberg Laws. Does an infringement on my rights passed by a majority, justify the limiting of my rights?

Mr. Rider accuses me of being lazy. "...he is willing to spend 5 minutes each semester getting his cash refund, even if 10,000 students want him to."

First of all, I am a graduate student and I don't have to pay the $2. I wrote my letter as an advocate for the undergraduate students. Secondly, writing these letters is more work than standing in line. Thirdly, if I were an undergraduate, I wouldn't want to stand in line one second, if I were coerced by a consumer organization.

Unfortunately, Ralph Nader has become a diety. Anything endorsed by Mr. Nader can't be bad, after all he doesn't even have a car or a phone and he is bringing in all that money. And isn't he interested in ecology?

JOSEPH KRAUSMAN

McGovern

To the Editor:

As it stands right now, Richard Nixon will win the G.O.P. nod as their candidate for the presidency.

The Democrats can't decide. The news media has Senator Muskie as the front-runner, but little noticed is the campaign of Senator George McGovern. His campaign is reminiscent of that of Senator Eugene McCarthy's of 1968. Students from New England all converge on small New Hampshire towns to convince the voters of the Granite State that George McGovern is the man to lead this country out of the war, out of the recession, and to change the national priorities.

So far in this presidential election year, we have had babies kissed, pretty girls hugged, snowball fights between the press and the candidates, and everything from pizza to Borsche eaten, but none have taken definite stands on any issues; none except Senator George McGovern.

The "liberal" press says that Senator Muskie is the man to end the war, forgetting he only started to be against the war in 1968. Up until then, he voted against every anti-war bill, and for all of the money to support that war. Senator George McGovern has been against the war since September, 1963.

This same press says that Senator Muskie will end the draft and replace it with an all volunteer army. They forget that he voted against the Hatfield-Goldwater Amendment of 1970, to end the draft and replace it with an all volunteer army.

Senator George McGovern has been an opponent of the draft since he took office.

These are only two examples. There are more. If you care about the quality of your life, and want to see America become the land of freedom again, then when you vote, vote for a candidate whose stand is consistent, a candidate who is not afraid to take a stand now. I think that if you look into it you will find that that man is Senator George McGovern.

Creation

To the Editor:

Today I will do a Valentine's Day poetry reading of Kenneth Patchen's love poems. In addition to celebrating the holiday the reading will also commemorate the death of Kenneth Patchen who died recently. (Perhaps there will also be time for Ferlinghetti's "Tyrrannus Nix?".)

The reading will be held from 12-2 p.m. today in the area of the Campus Center closest to the Hatch-where the concrete benches are.

Wherever the dead are, there they are and Nothing more. But you and I can expect
To see angels in the meadowgrass that look Like cows——
And wherever we are is paradise in furnished room without bath and six flights up
Is all God! We read
To one another, loving the sound of the s's
Slipping up on the t's and much is good Enough to raise the hair on our heads, like Rilke and Wilfred Owen.

Any person who loves another person,
Wherever in the world, is with us in this room——
Even though there are battlefields.

I wish you kisses and love on this St. Valentine's Day.

Letters To The Editor

As in previous years the MDC will continue to print letters to the editor. The only requirements are that they be typed at sixty spaces, double-spaced and absolutely no longer than two pages in length. All letters must be signed and the author's address and telephone numbers must be included. No letter will be published without this information. Also, no letters will be printed without the name of the author. Please note this change in policy.

All letters are subject to editing either for content or space according to the judgment of the editors. Also, due to space limitations, we do not guarantee that all letters will be printed.

THE EDITORS

Special Night

To the Editor:

I ate ham for supper Thursday night.

While this might not seem to be a very unusual fact I would like to point out to Steve Tripoli (re: his letter in Friday's Collegian) that Thursday was indeed "Rib Roast Special Night". Arriving at Berkshire Dining Commons after a late afternoon class I waited in line for a half hour only to find myself two persons away from being served the last piece of roast. Anticipating the meal which had been well advertised all week, I did not become discouraged, but waited patiently for the next batch of meat to be brought out. Only when it came, the Rib Roast was none other then a typical meal of ham. Oh well, the other added attractions could still make this meal a "special". Only there wasn't any dessert left or any cheese and crackers, the potatoes which were left behind waiting for the main course were cold, as was the soup. There were a few odd pieces of celery left and the last cup of coffee slowly drained into my cup. Leaving the dining commons I longingly grabbed for a banana to end off my "special" meal. But there weren't any.

I went right to the source to find out why I was served ham on "Rib Roast Special Night" and was told by the director of the D.C. that the reason for the shortage was twofold. 1.) More students ate supper at that D.C. than the previous nightly averages had indicated would. This would seem logical if the other D.C.'s reported leftovers, for there is no way of knowing how many will eat in each commons on a given night. However, the other commons ran out of food also and were sending students over to Berkshire to eat! 2.) The meat had not yielded the expected amount, therefore, a lesser number of students could be fed. I think this indicates extremely poor planning on the part of the supposed "food experts". The error in calculating was brushed aside by the reasoning that it is impossible to tell the exact number of students who eat supper. This is absurd! I'm sure that the Food Service Department is aware of how many meal tickets holders there are, and I'd be willing to bet my ham dinner that it would be safe to assume that a large percentage of students who eat two out of the three meals a day usually choose dinner as one of those meals, and would especially choose dinner on a "special night".

Don't mistake my intentions. My complaint lies not in the merits of roast vs ham, but rather in the principle involved. Many students did not receive what they paid for and what they were promised.

So Mr. Tripoli, perhaps you did pay for seconds, but I certainly paid for firsts! But never fear, "Special Night" will not be only once or twice a semester--but every month! Next month is Polish Night. So maybe when they run out of Kielbasa (although I was told this would never happen again) my substitute meal will be a piece of rib roast.

Taxation Without Reason

To the Editor:

During the last week I have read the articles in "The Collegian" about the SUG Board. As I understand it, the SUG Board feels that since each student at the University now pays a $60 annual Campus Center fee, policy making should be left to a student board with more than advisory status.

It is encouraging to see students requiring accountability for what they pay for from the University administration. But it seems odd, that there is such a commotion over the Campus Center fee when we annually pay fees for fine arts, athletics, health services, and various academic disciplines; even if we're not interested in art, have never been to a football game, don't plan on being sick, or will never take a course in the Physics Department. Unfortunately, these services are necessary to a large university so that it can present a complete educational system for all its students. It is evident that some sort of campus center complex is necessary as well, if not for the majority of students, then for the ones who use it. Consequently it does no good to talk of not funding any of these services-the issue is only how they are to be funded, and who will have control of the funds.

If the University can successfully make us pay for services we don't need, it's our fault for allowing it to. Why aren't we demanding accountability in teacher hiring and firing practices, equipment allocation, and curriculum innovation? Let's not waste time over a dead issue such as the Campus Center-the thirteen million dollars has already been spent, the building has to be paid for, and what the Massachusetts legislature doesn't appropriate has to come from the students' pockets.

Can It Help?

To the Editor:

To combat the feeling of hopelessness that has descended upon universities, WMPIRG proposes to consolidate the students into one cohesive body which can work within the laws to bring about change.

The two dollar fee which will be collected from students will be used to pay the full-time professionals who will make WMPIRG work. Logistically, this is the only feasible method to collect funds from the general university. To collect funds door-to-door would take at least as much time as the actual running of the organization. The ability of students to obtain a full refund will be WMPIRG's way of gauging how much backing it has from the students at the university. Every semester this will give the students the voice to approve or disapprove of what WMPIRG does.

Mr. Krausman is not being asked to pay the two dollar fee-he is a grad student. He accuses WMPIRG of being political and compares the group to Birchers, Communists, and Republicans. IF there is anything that Mr. Nader and his PIRG's have stood for it is integrity and non-partisanship.

Any tax can be looked upon as coersive. However, the WMPIRG tax is in the form of a democratic referendum-since it is refundable-a policy unheard of in this university.

WMPIRG is only looking for a chance to prove it can help.

Jolters Take Chiefs At Cage

It was the Chiefs vs. the Jolters at the Cage Saturday night. The Jolters won UMass' first skating event 47-46. Chiefs try to put a man out front as a jamming period begins (upper left). The point is to get someone one lap ahead and through the pack again. Chief's jammer Judi McGuire warms up during the pre-game period (upper right). Ann Calvello of the Jolters #7 (lower left carries Maureen O' Brien #18 of the Chiefs. Moments later, Calvello merely dropped her on the floor. Cliff Butler of the Jolters hangs on to the railing as Jim Lavarkas from Poor Richard's watches on. The crowd of about 2500 cheered and booed and all seemed to have a good time. The crowd of 2500 seemed "as enthusiastic as if it were a Redman basketball game" commented one observer. (MDC Photos by Al Jagoda, Gib Fullerton, Carl Nash)

Four-Year College Idea Challenged

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

A basic assumption of America higher education-that it takes four years to get through college-is being challenged on campuses across the country.

It has long been possible for the gifted or particularly hard working studet to finish a bachelor's degree in less than four years. The push now is to shorten the time the average student spends in college.

"We have realized there is nothing magic about four years," said Robert Engel, assistant to the president of the University of Iowa. "It is just a tradition that has hung on."

Several hundred colleges now offer students ways to finish in less than four years, most often by taking summer courses or taking tests instead of courses for a limited number of credits.

Within the past year, however, a few dozen schools have investigated or adopted a more radical alternative: A restructuring of the basic curriculum so it lasts three years instead of four years. Although still considered an experiment, it is a change that could have far-reaching effects on higher education.

College administrators cited two major reasons for going to three-year programs. Students coming from high school are better prepared, they said, and lopping off a year can mean substantial financial savings for both students and schools.

The State University of New York at Genessee, N.Y., has the largest of the half-dozen or so three-year programs begun last fall. More than 100 of the 800 incoming freshmen opted for the program on one week's notice.

"Most four-year curriculums have so much repetition and so many watered down courses that we found we could eliminate a year and still offer a quality education," said Virginia Kemp, acting vice president for academic affairs at Genesee.

Despite tougher courses, people in Genesee's three-year program had about the same first semester grades as four-year students, Miss Kemp said.

Ripon College, a 1,000-student liberal arts school in Wisconsin, is one of a score of schools that will institute three-year programs next fall.

"We have far fewer people who want a full-blown four years with all the social trappings," said Ripon President Bernard Adams. "They want to get through college and into graduate school or other things as quickly as possible."

Ripon will require students in the three-year program to maintain significantly higher grades, but Adams said anyone admitted to Ripon should be able to take it and succeed. At Ripon, as elsewhere, there is no thought of making the three-year program mandatory.

Princeton, Iowa and Utah are among the universities considering instituting or expanding three-year programs, as are Claremont Men's College in California, Emory University in Atlanta and Kuskingum College in Ohio.

Flash Flood?

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) - The weather service river forecast center here issued Sunday a flash flood watch for Connecticut, Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

An intensifying storm, combined with slowly rising temperatures is expected to produce heavy rainfall over Southern New England and Southeastern New York into tonight, the announcement said.

If rainfall of about 2 or more inches falls, flash flooding of small streams and brooks in the watch area will occur. All interests in the vicinity of these streams and brooks should be alert to this situation, the weather service said.

New Vaccine Developed

STANFORD, Calif. (AP) Sometime in the next two months a child will take a drop of cherry red liquid on his tongue and swallow his way into American medical history.

He will become the first member of the general public in the United States to take a polio vaccine prepared with living human tissue cells.

For Dr. Leonard Hayflick, a 44-year-old professor of medical microbiology at Stanford University here, the event will culminate a 10-year battle to change the way vaccines are manufactured. It will end a decade of scientific controversy and could open an era eventually affecting everyone receiving vaccines for diseases such as polio, mumps, measles and rubella.

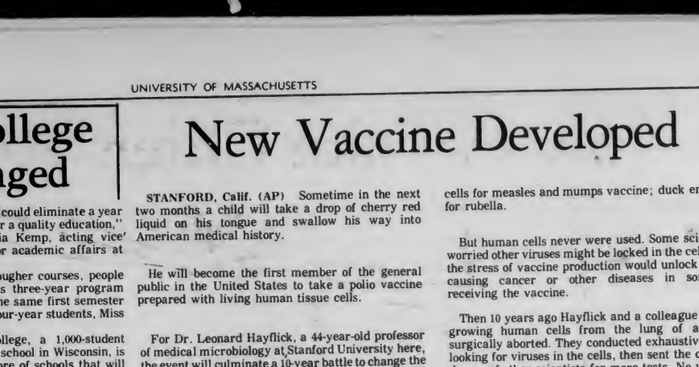
"It opens the door and means all vaccines eventually can be produced with human cells. It means vaccines are going to be safer and cheaper and we'll be able to achieve levels of standardization that weren't possible before," Hayflick asserted in an interview.

To produce a vaccine, large quantities of the virus it fights must be grown, using living animal cells as the soil. Polio virus, for example, is grown in kidney tissue of African green monkeys.

But only one batch of vaccine is produced from each monkey, even though secondary cell cultures could be grown and more virus particles produced. Scientists feared producing "secondary" cultures from a "primary" culture might produce contaminants.

Similar techniques are used with chicken embryo cells for measles and mumps vaccine; duck embryo for rubella.

But human cells never were used. Some scientists worried other viruses might be locked in the cells and the stress of vaccine production would unlock them, causing cancer or other diseases in someone receiving the vaccine.



Then 10 years ago Hayflick and a colleague began growing human cells from the lung of a fetus surgically aborted. They conducted exhaustive tests looking for viruses in the cells, then sent the cells to dozens of other scientists for more tests. No viruses were found, and the cells, called WI-38 cells, were pronounced clean. There was no evidence that starting new secondary cultures of the cells caused unwanted changes.

Meanwhile, other researchers began finding dangerous viruses in monkey and chicken tissue.

Scientists devised tests to screen for these viruses in vaccines prepared with animal tissue, but the possibility that a test might fail or an unknown virus slip through remained.

As a solution, Hayflick and his colleague proposed growing vaccine viruses in the WI-38 cells. There would be no risk of unknown animal viruses. It would be cheaper, since monkeys, for example, cost about $50 each and maintaining laboratory animals is expensive. And using the same, intensively studied human cells in batch after batch of vaccine would allow standardization of vaccines impossible where a different animal is used for each batch.

WE HAVE uplifting SOLUTIONS TO EVERYDAY PROBLEMS.

In this instance, we are lifting a complete house to demonstrate a new concept of aerial delivery of assembly line-produced dwellings from factory to homesite.

But... this same Sikorsky® helicopter could have been effecting a rescue mission off a wallowing tanker in a North Sea gale. It could have been airlifting food and supplies to starving villagers in flood-ravaged Tunisia ... or transporting equipment for on-the-spot control of off-shore oil pollution.

Obviously, what we're pointing out is the impressive record and adaptability of our helicopters in solving really important human problems.

There's much more to come in our world of exciting, advanced VTOL aircraft systems. For example, Heavy-Lift Skycranes® and Tilt-Rotor Transports. And just around the corner are our High-Speed Commercial Transports—designed to ease short-haul mass transportation headaches.

Does this kind of engineering attitude stir your sense of responsibility and imagination? Then you should talk careers with us. There's ample opportunity for innovation in: autonavigation systems • avionics • computer technology • electronic test • materials engineering • mechanical analytical design • structures engineering • systems analysis ... and more.

Female, minority group and veteran applicants especially welcome.

D.V.P. Seeks New Members

The Distinguished Vistors Program is currently seeking new members for the balance of this year and next year.

D.V.P. is the organization prinicipally responsible for bringing speakers to campus. It is run entirely by students and financed by a special student tax of 75 cents per student per semester.

Planning a schedule for the year usually begins the previous spring when we solicit suggestions from the university community and write over one hundred letters to prospective speakers. As replies come in through the summer and early fall, the committee tries to select a program balanced in subject matter and points of view. This year, D.V.P. has sponsored lectures by people as diverse as author Joe Heller, satirist Art Buchwald, Howard Zinn on civil obedience, Nicholas Fiumara on venereal disease, Angela Davis's lawyer Howard Moore, John McManus of the John Birch Society, Eric Rouleau of Le Monde on the Middle East, feminist Joyce Ladner, Bill Stricland of the Institute of the Black World, and conversationalist Jean Shepard. Yet to come this semester are sports entrepreneur Bill Veeck, well-known community organizer Saul Alinsky, nutritionist Adele (You are what you eat) Davis, and Dr. C.H. Li, an expert on hormonal research.

D.V.P. is also the principal sponsor of the annual Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial Lecture Series each April. On this year's program are a slide show and lecture on Black Art by Barry Gaither of the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts in Boston, an Afro-Caribbean dance troupe from the Elma Lewis School, and a lecture by Imamu Baraka (Leroy Jones).

Students running a program have the responsibility of handling all communications with the speaker, reserving an auditorium, publicity, and setting up meetings with classes, radio and press interviews, and coffee hours.

Those interested in helping to shape the course of the UMass lecture series for the coming year and meeting many interesting people, can apply to the Distinguished Vistors Program. D.V.P. seeks a membership diverse in backgrounds, interests, and academic fields. Application forms will be available through this Friday, February 18, in the Student Activities Office on Level One of the Campus Center.

Applications Now Being Accepted For Summer Program In Italy

Applications for the University's 1972 Summer Program in Italy are now being accepted, according to Professor Zina Tillona, Director of the Program. Enrollment is limited to 65 students and, since the Program attracts a greater number of applicants from other colleges and universities each year, those interested are urged to apply early to avoid possible disappointment. Closing date for application materials is March 15.

Although the Summer Program in Italy is not geared specifically to any one discipline or to language study, Italy--its language, its history, and its people--is the focus of all courses, and each acquires an added dimension by virtue of the fact that it is taught in the country itself. The courses which will be offered in 1972 are: Art 245-Italian Art of the Early and High Renaissance; History 394-Conflict between Conscience and Country in Italy; Anthropology 380-Field Dourse in Cultural Anthropology; Italian 140-Intermediate Italian; CAS 390 (Humanities)-Classicism and Anti Classicism in Renaissance Art and Literature. In addition, Italian majors and other qualified students may arrange to undertake an independent study in Italian Literature.

Classes are held in the Bologna Center of John Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies. This building, which is thoroughly air-conditioned and one of the most modern in Bologna, is located in the heart of the University of Bologna and close to the center of the city.

The group will arrive in Bologna on June 20 for a brief period of orientation. The summer school session is of seven weeks duration including field trips to nearby cultural centers. After August 10 students will be free to explore on their own both Italy and nearby countries. Those wishing to remain in Bologna may, of course, do so at their own expense. Departure for the United States will be on August 26.

The estimated total cost of the Program is $850. This amount includes air transportation to and from the United States, tuition, health and library fees, travel and lodging in Italy and should cover most meals in Bologna whether paid directly by the Program or by the student himself. Expenses for the free travel time at the conclusion of the Program are in addition to $850 and should be budgeted for.

Students interested in obtaining information about or in enrolling in the Program should see Professor Tillona, Herter Hall 320, at their earliest convenience.

The name of the group is the Students and Faculty Economic Association (SAFE). As its name implies, SAFE is dedicated to providing economic benefits and services to both college students and faculty. Some of these benefits incinde special discounts designed to conserve the money of its members. Because of its collective bargaining power, SAFE is, for example, able to offer most American cars at $ 100 to $ 125 over dealer cost with local delivery and service. To students and faculty members who already own a car SAFE offers a well-known brand of tires at 45% off the manufacturer's suggested list price (-30% on snow tires).

SAFE offers at a discount a wide variety of major and minor merchandise items through two mail order catalogs and a quarterly purchase flyer. The Association sponsors magazine subscriptions at special student rates, a free film program, and a brand new service, the SAFE discount card, which the Association is promoting merchants and retail establishments off-campus. Simply, a bearer of the SAFE card receives either free gifts or extra discounts when he patronizes a store carrying the SAFE discount emblem in its window. The Association offers similar savings on hi-fi equipment and tapes and low cost charter flights to exotic vacation locales all over the world.

Recently SAFE expanded its services into the area of tuition financing by members' parents, and a career placement service. This is in addition to its many fine insurance plans that offer the student (or faculty member) a choice term or deferred payment permanent life insurance, and one of the lowest cost hospitalization "cash income" programs ever made available. Faculty members and Student members of SAFE who have graduated and secured a full time position may apply for up to $10,000 and up to $5,000 respectively through a national lending program that requires no collateral.

According to Bruce Quinn, its executive director, SAFE is different from any other student association in that it was modeled after two of the most highly successful professional economic associations in the country, the National Association of Residents and Interns (NARI) and the American Professional Practice Association (APPA). NARI and APPA are both sister associations of SAFE and number almost 80,000 physicians and dentists in their combined memberships. "We have tried to avoid the many pitfalls other more prominent groups encountered in attempting to serve the college market," he says. "We think we have a basic benefit package that appeals to these people. And more importantly, we have es ablished 28 local offices, through an arrangement with the Student Economic Service Corp., to provide on-the-spot economic assistance and advice to our present 30,000 campus members."

Mobe Plans Teach-In

During the recent meeting, the Student Mobilization Committee discussed upcoming business as concerning the antiwar activities for the coming weeks. Ideas were brought up as how best to explain the recent increase in air power in Nixon's War. A Teach-in was decided as the best way to bring the war back to the students and to explain the recent increase in air strikes in Indochina while troop withdrawals continue. The purpose of the Teach-in, according to Mobe, is to clear up the confusion thrown by Nixon about the stepped up air war and to explain his "peace" plan, while the confusing belief that he is "winding down" the war, continues. No date as of yet has been decided upon because final arrangements haven't been concluded with speakers.

A special slide show, especially dealing with the air war in Southeast Asia will be presented and arrangements with the Greater Boston Peace Action Coalition to get the slide show was voted upon and passed.

In other business it was decided to send a delegation to the National Student Antiwar Conference to be held in New York City, Feb. 25-27, and to publicize the conference. Members volunteered to seek endorsements by student-run groups in the are to support this conference.

A PAULIST DOESN'T WAIT TO BE ORDAINED TO GET INVOLVED.

If you think that ordination is something like graduation —and the time in between is similar to marking time—then you couldn't be more mistaken.

The Paulists were founded with the belief that each man is a member of the community and he contributes his own thing. Each is an individual with his own talents and he is given the freedom to use them in his own way. But not later. Now.

For instance, during the novitiate, novices work in such diverse areas as hospitals, vocational rehabilitation centers and Universities. They serve as assistant chaplains, co-retreat masters, student teachers and psychiatric aides.

Paulist Seminarians create recreational programs, direct "Days of Recollection" for CCD students, direct film series, experiment with the use of media in the liturgy as a preaching tool, originate and edit the Paulist Free Press, coordinate Lenten lectures and organize Home Masses, to mention just a few.

When you commit yourself to the Paulists, it isn't a someday thing. It's now. Today.

For more information about the Paulists write to: Rev. Donald C. Campbell, C.S.P., Vocation Director, Room 300.

One-Man Show At Top Of Campus

A one-man show by UMass Associate Professor John Grillo will open at The Top of the Campus, UMass Campus Center, Thursday, Feb. 17.

The exhibition will run through April 17. Included are four silk screen prints and seven paintings, the largest of which is a 21-foot triptych entitled "Trinity" in three panels.

The Massachusetts-born artist studied at the California School of Fine Arts in San Francisco and with Hans Hoffman in Europe. He has had recent one-man shows at the Tibor de Nagy Gallery and the Dain Gallery, both in New York City, and a Grillo work, one of several owned by the museum, is now on exhibit at the Guggenheim Museum in New York.

He is represented also in the collections of the Whitney Museum in New York City, the Wadsworth Atheneum, Hartford, Conn., the Los Angeles County Museum, the Walker Art Center in Minneapolis, and at Wellesely, Bennington and Smith Colleges, and also in several corporate collections. Among the latter is the Olsen Foundation of Guilford, Conn.; the James A. Michener Foundation of Austin, Texas; the Westinghouse Corporation of Pittsburgh and Geigy Chemical of Rye, N.Y.

His work has been included in group shows at such leading museums at New York's Museum of Modern Art, the Boston Center of the Arts and the Brooklyn Museum.

By SYDNEY OMARR

When it comes to expressions of love Leo can be most dramatic. Libra can be tender and Gemini can be funny. Scorpio is intense and Sagittarius is grand. Aries is forceful and Taurus is determined. Cancer is tenacious and Virgo is analytical. When Cupid strikes Capricorn it is "for real," while Aquarius responds nobly. Pisces can be devastated or lifted to the clouds. There is no in between. For all zodiacal signs, love is all-important. And to all, Happy St. Valentine's Day!

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Accent friendly approach. Maintain balance and stress humanitarianism. Your wishes, with regard to opposite sex, can be fulfilled. Look beyond surface indications. Overall view brings desired results.

TAURUS (April 20-MAY 20): Recognition for civic efforts is due. You may be surprised. What you thought others took for granted is not that way. Creative move impresses professional superior. You're going in right direction.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Don't lose sight of potential, you have a long way to go-but journey is worth it. Means you can rise above obstacles. You learn now how to apply philosophical concepts. You become a bigger, better person.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Some around you are intense. Display humor, but don't laugh at wrong moment. Question of financial settlement is apt to be paramount. Sagittarian figures prominently. You get to bottom of mystery.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Emphasis on joint effort, tying together loose ends. Be aware of public relations. Question concerning marriage can be settled. Check details. It may be necessary to consult legal expert. Be thorough.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept. 22): Work, health problems can be solved. Know this and avoid tendency to brood. Change works in your behalf. Don't resist progress. Get together with one who shares you interests. Gemini is involved.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You are revitalized. Your ideas are young. You come alive. Friends and family pay meaningful compliments. You can make successful domestic adjustments. Give and receive gifts. You're going to be happier.

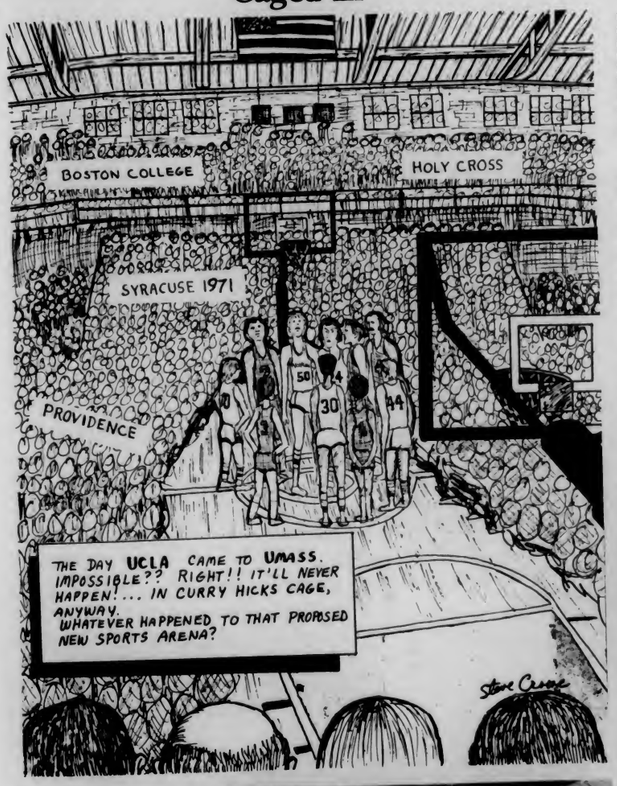
Frosh Overcome Huskies

By FRANK ANTOSIEWICZ

The UMass freshman basketball team once again overcame the fine play of Earl Wilson to whip the Connecticut frosh 92-78. For the second game in a row, Coach Gaudette's charges had to come from down under to pull away. The dazzling Earl threatened to run away with the game in the first half, but Mike Flanagan coolly tossed in 7 of 10 to close the gap to five at the half, 40-35. "One of the few nights, I had to open shots, so I took them," said the New Hampshire native.

The second half began with the frosh stealing the show (4 steals in three minutes) to tie at 41-41. Wilson spurted the Huskies to a six point lead, but that was the beginning of the end for the boys from Storrs.



A play called "reverse action" devised by Coach Leaman, was performed to perfection. John Murphy sunk the go ahead basket and along with teammate Tom Gillams, thrived on the success of "the play". This had to be the key as the beleagured Huskies ran into the one and one foul situation with more than 13 minutes to go. From that point on, the remarkable result was that Earl Wilson, who was now forced to defend against the big men, was unable to score for the rest of the night and fouled out at the four minute mark. John Murphy commented on reverse action. He said, "It allowed Tom (Gillams) to get free, as Wilson could not play two men nor both ends of the court at the same time."

After the contest, Coach Fan Gaudette had nothing but praise for his players. He said, "This team has to be the toughest physically and mentally around. They didn't let themselves get knocked out of the game, after getting only three minutes warmup time and Gillams missed the bus. They stuck together after a tough first half to win the game." Tom Gillams best expressed the play of the team as "mental conhesiveness. We played together as a tight team."

Yearling Dribblings: Jim Burke held Livramento, who was averaging 19 points/game to only 3 baskets and had his finest game of the year collecting 16 points. Earl Wilson took game honors with 28 points. The balance UMass yearlings were led by Flanagan with 27, and followed by Gillams, 26, Burke and Murphy, 13. They also hit 24-27 free throws as opposed to only 12 for Conn.

"Caged-In"

And The Flame Dies...

SAPPORO, Japan (AP)-The sacred flame of the Olympic Winter Games slowly dwindled and disappeared Sunday night after burning for 11days over the ice and snow athletes of 35 nations.

It will be re-ignited in 1976 in Denver, Colo., for the 12th Winter Olympics.

Athletes who had marched in precisely formed national units to open the games were mingled in the colors, nations and tongues as they marched in and out of Makomanai indoor ice arena for the closing ceremony.

The Olympic flame, which burned in a hugh cauldron above the outdoor ice skating rink was displayed on a huge video screen at it gradually died out or-in the words of the program-"returned to the sun."

The closing ceremony was preceded by an exhibition by figure skating medal winners in the Games and by the presentation of medals to Sunday's winners of the men's slalom-headed by the happy Spaniard, Francisco Fernandez Ochoa, who surprised everybody, including himself, by winning the gold medal.

Avery Brundage, president of the International Olympic Committee, officially declated the games closed at 7:40 p.m., Japan time, 5:40 a.m. EST Sunday and summoned the youth of the world to assemble again in Denver in '76.

Women Gymnasts Romp

By STEVE CARY

From the spectator's point of view, the women's varsity gymnastics meet with Penn State University, Saturday, was more of an exhibition than a competitive activity. Without slighting the effort from State College, it was an obvious mismatch. The final totals of 102.75 points for UMass 74.15 for Penn State simply lack meaning as a contest in a sport where to win by 5 points is a solid trouncing.

The real excitement was generated through the individual efforts of our University's team members, who scored in excess of 100 points for the first time in their history. Sophomore co-captain Margie Combs, in one of the finest gymnastic performances to date from either men's or women's teams, took every first position available, averaging 9.09 per event for Floor Exercise, Side Horse Vault, Balance Beam, and Uneven Parallel Bars, giving her a career high of 36.35 for the All Around. Junior, Marina Rodriguez was second All Around with routines of characteristic grace and beauty, for a 32.05, and third despite recent illness and severe misfortunes on Balance Beam and Uneven Bars, was freshman Gail Hanson with a 28.6.

For the remaining second and third places on specific events were on Floor Exercise, Ann Vexler, 8.8, and Gail Hannon, 8.3; on Side Horse Vaulting, Gail Hannon, who surprised me personally with a 9.0 jump worthy of every tenth, and Marina Rodriguez, 8.2, followed by Jeanine Burger with a broken routine at 7.0; and finally on Unevens, co-captain Betsey East with a very difficult exercise scoring 8.9, and once again Marina Rodriguez with an 8.05. Freshmen deserving attention are Miss Burger who is probably as talented in the All Around as anyone to have entered this school, but who has suffered a recent leg injury, Thanne Poth who has a fresh style with a capacity for dramatic exercises, and bouncy Candy Gross who unquestionably set a new record for smiling continuously in her Floor Exercise.

As I began, the meet was for us an exhibition, but to the girls and their new training coach Miss Virginia B. Evans, it was a practice and a warmup for superior performances. They shall host the Vaundriel Silhouettes of Montreal and Clarion, Pa., at 7 p.m. in the Cage this Saturday, and then travel to the home of the defending Eastern League Champions, Springfield this Wednesday. It is time to recognize the presence at our university of a team that will be in contention for the national title this year in a significant international sport. They are people who work to achieve, and they deserve your attendance. I know they appreciate the chances they have to thrill their audiences with their presentation.

Hoopmen Continue Skid

By EARLE BARROLL

STORRS, Conn. - Rhode Island is off the hook...UMass let them back into the Yankee Conference race with a 58-56, "you-can-have- it-I-don't-want-it loss" to UConn here Saturday night.

This was the first loss of the season in the Conference for UMass (now 11-8), and their first after 20 straight spanning two and a half seasons. Both UMass and URI are 4-1 in the YanCon and according to Jack Leaman, "We let Rhody off the hook and now we have to beat them to prove we are a good team."

Poor is perhaps the best way to describe this game. Both squads didn't seem to want this one and if a third party was present neither team would have won. The Redmen had more opportunities than UConn to put the game away, but numerous turnovers in key instances squandered any intentions of the kind.

Top this off with an inability for the UMass front court to stop UConn inside and the impatience of their offense in contending with the zone and welcome home UConn, you're a winner over UMass at last.

Leaman was very critical over the night's proceedings: "We couldn't stop Chapman and Custick, their two big forwards and this definitely hurt. And with Skinner with four fouls and Coffin fouled out we just couldn't do a thing about it.

"Against the zone we were impatient. It's like a turnover when you put up a shot quickly and aren't in position to go for a possible rebound."

What really bugged Leaman was his team's lack of resistance to the UConn board game. "The UMass trademark over the seasons has been rebounding," he said, "but when teams start beating you with your own trademark, you're in for a lot of trouble."

The Redmen were up by one when the second half got underway, but quickly jumped on top by 38-32 and seemingly on their way to stay when John Betancourt went in all alone but missed a reverse layup. A UConn field goal brought the Huskies back, but UMass went ahead by five until UConn hit five consecutive points to tie the game up.

From here on in the lead was tied five more times before UConn froze the ball for about a minute and Custick hit on a short jumper to go ahead by two. Tom McLaughlin missed a shot moments later and UConn froze the ball again until Chapman got free for a layup.

With ten seconds remaining, Doug Melody was fouled but missed on the first of a one and one. Mike Pagliara hustled down and threw a bomb in to cut the lead in half with three seconds left.

On the ensuing pass in, the ball was batted to half court where Peter Trow was unable to get a solid attempt off.

Leaman is now planning some changes for Tuesday's game with Boston University. "I've got to make them," he said, "I'm not pleased with the front court...this is the cause of all the problems. McLaughlin is the only one playing well up front. Next game I'm starting Peters for one. I'll stay with Mac, and the other spot is up for grabs."

Currently mired in their longest winless stretch in three seasons, Leaman put forth one explanation: "Mentally, it's tough to lose three games in eight days by eight points on the road. It has to work on you. We've been away too long, playing only three games at home since December 14. And I'm happy we have two games in a row at home (B.U. and URI on Saturday) at this time in the season."

Keenan Goal Beats NU In OT

By ALAN K. WRIGHT

As usual, Junior Center Pat Keenan from Weston, Ontario became the UMass hockey hero of the night Saturday. This time he did it by scoring the winning goal against Northeastern University in overtime to record a 5-4 victory in what had to be the best home game of this season.

The game was primarily nip and tuck all the way, with stretches of dominated play by both teams at various times throughout the game. The Huskies took charge early, got hot and scored two quick goals at 1:31 and 2:26 of the opening period. Goalie P.J. Flaherty was caught unaware of both markers seemingly being screened out on the first while the second slipped through his legs.

Minutes later, at 8:23 Bob "Chico" Shea put UMass on the scoreboard by picking up a loose puck from in back of the blue line and zeroing in on the net like a magnet. The Northeastern netminder never saw it, much less got his stick on it. He developed his reactions shortly after, though, by deflecting a boomer from UMass defenseman Don Lowe.

Another UMass scoring threat came just before the end of the period when spirited Eric Scrafield led a 3 on none break-away and Don Riley was called for being offsides.

Northeastern upped their lead to 3-1 at 7:11 of Period 2 when Kevin Delaney scored from a point-blank range. But, Captain Brian Sullivan responded by hustling the length of the ice to score at 13:00 with an assist from Mike Waldron.

Pat Keenan soon became hungry for the puck and connected from thirty feet out on the left hand side through a crowd of skaters on assists from Ran Reidy and Jack Edwards at 18:49.

The game wasn't blemished with very many penalties until the final period when they started occurring in bunches. In fact, at one point Northeastern had three men in the box at once along with Redman Dan Reidy. As a result of this situation, the UMass power play was effectively executed when Brian Sullivan literally dribbled the puck into the crease area in front of the goal and speedy Don Riley stabbed it in on what appeared like almost a fluke goal to make it 4-3 UMass.

There was still confusion as to the penalty situation for some time into the third period when the Huskie's outstanding sophomore Wayne Blanchard scored his second goal of the night at 14:47 to ultimately send the game into overtime.

The stage was set, the atmosphere was electric at Orr Rink and from the minute the puck dropped in front of Keenan to face off during the sudden death, he put on a show of hockey brilliance. Pat went wild, firing several lined shots, only to be denied on all of them. It seemed like an eternity until Jack Edwards and Dan Reidy got together on the feed to Keenan at 5:00 even when Pat rocketed the puck out of a scramble out front to light the lamp and send everybody home happy.

The elated Canadian ace skater was all smiles after the game when he exclaimed, "I thought it would never happen, but I finally got the range."

Olympic Roundup

SAPPORO, Japan (AP) - "A story book ending," said one man who helped write it, unflappable U.S. hockey goaltender Michael Curran.

"Unbelievable," said Coach Murray Williamson.

But there the American hockey players were-thanks to some help from Russia and Finland-with silver medals no one would have predicted winning when the 1972 Winter Olympics opened 10 days earlier.

And the Games in Japan's scenic, snowy north ended with one other surpirse-the first medal ever won by Spain in any Winter Olympics. Francisco Fernandez Ochea, 21, won the men's slalom run down the tricky, corkscrew Mt. Teine course by a margin of one full second.

In Sunday's only other event, Vyacheslav Vedenin made up a one minute deficit over the last 10 kilometers as Russia won the 40 kilometer cross country skiing relay by a 50-second margin over Norway.

That gave Russia a total of eight gold, five silver and three bronze medals and a wide victory margin in the medals race.

The United States finished fifth with three golds, two silvers and three bronzes, behind Russia, East Germany with 4-3-7, Switzerland with 4-3-3 and the Netherlands with 4-3-2.

The hockey medal was the only one earned by American men. The others were won by women athletes with the three golds going to Northbrook, Ill., speed skaters Dianne Holum, 20, and Anne Henning, 16, and to slalom skier Barbara Cochran, 21, of Richmond, Vt.

The U.S. hockey squad finished its competition Saturday night with a 6-1 victory over Poland, giving it three victories and two losses. It could have finished anywhere from fourth to second-and the Americans went out to cheer for the Russians to beat Czechoslovakia Sunday, which would clinch third for the Americans.

But then the unexpected happened. Besides Russia polishing off Czechoslovakia 5-2 in the showdown for the gold medal, Finland upset Sweden 4-3, knocking the Swedes out of the medal race.

The Russians ended up with four victories and a 3-3 tie against Sweden, and the Americans and the Czechoslavaks both had 3-2 records-but since the Americans beat the Czechoslovaks 5-1 earlier, they got the silver.

"Was it hard to root for the Russians?"

"It was very easy," said Williamson. "I admire the Russians. They are good hockey players and good athletes."

And besides, he said, five games against the Russians earlier this season gave the Americans "a good lesson in European hockey-something we hadn't been exposed to."

"If I had it do do over again, I would like another crack at the Swedes," Williamson said. The Swedes were one team that beat the Americans, 5-1 in a game only 16 hours after the Americans defended their right to play in the Class A tournament of the Olympics with a 5-3 victory over Switzerland. The other team was Russia, with a 7-2 victory.

Early in the tournament, Williamson said, "The breaks were against us. Later they were for us. We consider ourselves very fortunate and satisfied."

Even before the Finnish and Russian victories put the Americans into second place, Williamson said he considered the American hockey showing a success since the other Class A teams enjoyed a six-to-seven-year edge in experience.

The United States had three of the four youngest players in the tournament-16-year-old Mark Howe, son of former Detroit Red Wing superstar Gordie Howe; Robbie Ftorek, 20, of Needham, Mass., and Henry Boucha, 20, of Warread, Minn. The fourth young player was Soviet goalie Vladislav Tretiak, 19.

"Howe held his own throughout the tournament," Williamson said, but the Detroit youngster said he was dissatisfied with his performance.

"I played okay on defense but I missed a lot of goals I should have had," Howe said.

Overall, Williamson said, "I would just have to say it was a courageous performance...every kid played to the fullest of his potential."

This was the American's first Olympic hockey medal since they beat the Russians in the final game and won the gold in 1960 in Squaw Valley, Calif.

Goalie Curran came up with two excellent games in the Americans 5-1 victory over Czechoslovakia and their 4-1 triumph over Finland. For the Finnish game, the Americans were tired after their rugged contest against Russia, and Curran's saves-some at almost point blank range-helped his teammates win that game which had a crucial bearing on their race for a medal.

JV Skaters Edged By Yale

By TOM PLANT

Time was of the essence for a number of UMass teams this past weekend, including the J.V. hockey team. As the basketball team went down to the wire in their loss to UConn, and the Varsity hockey team had to go into overtime to defeat Northeastern, the J.V.'s simply ran out of time on Saturday afternoon in New Haven and the Yale J.V.'s hung on to win, 6-5.

After falling behind by three goals, the largest margin of the game, with half of the third period gone, the J.V. Redmen struck back to within one with only seconds remaining. With 19 seconds left, goalie Chick Rheault was replaced by an extra UMass forward, but there just was not enough time to set up any scoring opportunity.

Earlier in the season the J.V. Redmen defeated the Yale Freshmen team, 6-4. Against the Yale J.V.'s they made an impressive showing, although once again they were troubled by poor passing. Yale goalie, Bing Gordon, made 33 saves in the game, but the Redmen didn't get a chance to show their best shots to him. Rheault had 30 saves.

Yale's Chip Davison opened the scoring at 6:03 of the first period, with assists from Frenchman Yves Prechac and Canadian Mike Flatters. But, as it seems to be the pattern of the J.V.'s this season, they came right back a minute later to tie it on a goal by Kevin Thompson. Later, with a Yale player in the box for holding, the Redmen briefly took the lead on a patented Mike Ellis slap-shot from the point. Defenseman Ellis had another fine game, and continues to play superbly after a layoff in the middle of the season due to medical reasons. That made the score 2-1, but Yale's Pete McNerney evened the score again at 10:12.

It took half the second period for Yale to take the lead again on a goal by John Parks. Then at 14:23 the UMass J.V.'s again took advantage of a power-play situation as Ned Mahoney took a pass from Brian Mulcahy and skated in with two Redmen escorts to score the goal. Only seconds later, Parks of Yale broke the tie again. Rheault made the initial save, but Parks was there to flip in the rebound, making the score 4-3 at the end of the second period.

At 1:45, UMass again had a power-play advantage, but this time could manage only one shot as Yale began to control the action. Greg Wiber of Yale scored an unassisted goal at 9:13 of the period, and Dave Starkman added another a minute later, putting the Bulldogs ahead, 6-3. Then the J.V. Redmen started to click. Ned Mahoney scored his second goal on a rebound of Jim Murphy's shot at 13:15, and, still fighting back, Kevin Connors tipped in a shot by his brother, Jay, to bring them within one goal with less than two minutes left.

JOE Ends: Success Proclaimed

By DONALD BISHOP

Amidst general feelings of success and optimism, the Juvenile Opportunities Extention (JOE) Program was officially terminated yesterday at a morning press conference. The press conference, which was attended by representatives of the local news media, was addressed by the JOE Coordinator Larry Dye, Campus Center Director Gerald Scanlon, and Dean of Students William Field.

Dye opened up the conference by quoting a number of facts related to the Program. According to Dye, the month long conference served 99 youths, 25 girls and 74 boys. Of these, 6 had come in as runaways during the course of the program while 3 other youths had come in from problem homes. The remaining juveniles had been brought in from the Lyman and Lancaster Schools, and the Westfield Detention Center.

The relative success of the Program can be judged in immediate terms, through the placement figures Dye released. 41 of the youths have gone from UMass back to their own homes. 11 have been placed in what Dye referred to as a "foster care environment." 34 more were sent to a non-institutionalized "group home". Finally 7 youths were returned to institutions and 6 were listed as being runaways from the program.

At the start of the Program, Dye had hoped for a maximum placement of 75% of the youths, therefore, the actual 90% figure pleased Dye and the others involved with the Program. The long range success of the Program, according to Dye, will be judged in terms of "how many and how well the youths make the adjustment back into the community." Follow-up studies will be done to determine the long range success of the program.

Dye, in his short speech, went on to thank Mr. Scanlon and the various RSO groups, the juvenile detention center supervisors, the student advocates, and the general student body for the support they had given the Program during its four week duration.

Scanlon and Dean Field spoke briefly and concentrated their remarks on expressing their pleasure with the success of JOE, and commending University students for their general support.

A question and answer period followed the informal presentations of the three. One question came up concerning the use of the "advocates" in the program. Dye revealed that there had been personality conflicts between 18 of the advocates and their charges. This resulted in the transfer of 8 of the advocates to different youths in the program and the dropping of 10 of the advocates altogether.

In response to another question on the future of the Program, Dye revealed that there are no plans for a continuation of JOE at UMass, either in the immediate or the distant future. There is a possibility that programs similar to JOE could be organized at either North Shore Community College or Boston University, both of which have requested information on JOE from Dye.

Another likelihood is that the whole concept of JOE could be done away with in this state, due to the creation in Massachusetts of what Dye called "residential treatment centers." These centers would take over the function of JOE, that of preparing the institutionalized youth for release back into the community. The impact of JOE could be felt in other states though, where no programs exist to help young delinquents adjust to society.

Finally, Dye responded to a question on what changes he would make, if JOE were ever to be initiated again. The coordinator of JOE stated that he would hold a stronger training program for both the youths and the advocates, thereby hopefully avoiding some of the personality problems that arose this past month. He also felt that improvements would be made in the daily schedule for the juveniles, allowing for less free time for the youths, while having more supervision.

SOS Holds First Meeting; Discusses Future Plans

By MDC STAFF

Students Offering Support (SOS)-an organization formed to express support and obtain funds for the Belchertown State School class suit-met for the first time ever last night and discussed various proposals concerning the future direction of the organization.

The two-hour meeting was attended by 23 people. The SOS members concentrated much of their time in discussing appropriate means of obtaining funds in support of the suit.

The suit filed by 28 parents of residents at the Belchertown School charges that the state Department of Mental Health has been negligent in the care of patients at the school. The parents were represented in U.S. District Court by Attorney Beryl W. Cohen who said earlier in the week that the case would have "national implications."

The members of SOS in their first official business formed three separate task forces with the hope of expanding the influence of the organization throughout the University and Amherst area.

The first task force would concentrate on making people within the University community aware of the issues involved in this historical suit.

The other two groups would concentrate on community and faculty involvement.

Chairman Joe Sylvia, a UMass Grad student, in his opening remarks said, "We need student support to insure we don't get thrown out of court."

UMass Professor Ben Ricci, president of the Belchertown Friends Association and organizer of the class action suit said, "If we lose this fight it won't be the Friends of Belchertown who will suffer, but certainly humanity will suffer."

Ricci explained to the group that the parents who filed the suit have limited funds while the state has the necessary funds to stretch the case over a long period of time in order to drain the funds of the parents.

"It would be a crime if we were to lose this case because we don't have the money to stick this out," stated Ricci in his closing remarks.

The Town

Amherst Approves New School

By CHARLEY BERKOW

It was intended to be just approval and go-ahead for the construction of a new elementary school building, but the special Town Meeting in Amherst last night became more of a lesson in geology. The school building was finally approved, despite questions of the suitability of the site raised by several local geologists.

"I just don't think we know enough about it to commit ourselves," said Don Doehring. But the members of the School Committee and the School Building Planning Committee seemed in no mood to delay construction of the building long enough to investigate the questions raised by Doehring and other area geologists any further.

A UMass assistant professor of Geology, Doehring said that a quick survey he conducted on the proposed school building site showed that the flood level might be above the proposed floor level of the school, and that the soil structure might not be able to support the building.

George Bain, a retired professor of Geology at Amherst College, and Gerald Brophy, a professor of Geology at Amherst College, both spoke in favor of committing the proposal to further study.

Mr. Alderman, of Alderman and MacNeish architects, said that studies by his experts showed that the proposed floor level was four feet above the flood level, and that the ground could easily support the one story building.

Ms. Keedy, who presented the school committee's proposal, said that the new school is needed as soon as possible. It is scheduled to be open by September, 1973. She said that the need for new classrooms is so urgent that the new school building will be architecturally identical to the Wildwood elementary school in Amherst. This, she explained, will cut down on the planning time of the new school.

Another school building committee member said that "we have a good bid from a competent contractor at a good price." It was explained that a very low bid which has been offered by a contractor must be acted upon within two or three weeks or it will be withdrawn.

Town Manager Allen Torrey pointed out that the architects have already been paid for the plans drawn up for the new school. "We've got plans drawn up in 1950, that we've paid for, for a school we've never built," he said. "I don't want to see that happen again."

The school building bond issue passed, 129 to 29, after nearly an hour and a half of debate.

The Town Meeting also authorized a recreational center to be established in North Amherst. The center, with an estimated cost of over 5 hundred thousand dollars, will contain a swimming-diving pool, athletic fields, tennis courts, and a combination basketball court-hockey rink, among other recreational facilities. It will be located adjacent to the present Amherst conservation area, near Montague Road. No recreational facilities currently exist in North Amherst, although an estimated 29% of the school-aged children of Amherst live there.

In other business, the Town Meeting approved a measure combining the management of the Jones Library and the Amherst public libraries. The combination must still be approved by the state legislature before it becomes effective.

FBI Arrests Soviet Citizen

WASHINGTON (AP)-The FBI arrested a Soviet citizen on espionage charges Monday night in connection with the solicitation of classified documents on the Navy's F14 jet fighter plane, FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover announced.

The FBI said Valeriy I. Markelov, who is employed at the United Nations, was arrested in a restaurant in Patchogue, N.Y., after an investigation that began in the fall of 1970.

Grumman Aerospace Corp., which developed and builds the F14, is based on Bethpage, N.Y.

The F.B.I. charged that Markelov attempted to acquire the documents on the swing-wing plane from a Grumman engineer. The engineer, who was not identified, contacted U.S. authorities when Markelov first made his acquaintances and cooperated throughout the investigation, the FBI said.

According to the bureau, Markelov had 11 separate meetings with the engineer at various restaurants in the New York area and "persistently requested confidential information" on the F14.

Hoover said FBI agents witnessed all the meetings and arrested Markelov after he took possession of documents Monday night.

The FBI said Markelov supplied a portable copying machine and a 35 mm camera to the engineer to reproduce the material. An affidavit was filed in U.S. District Court in New York, the FBI said.

The FBI said, Markelov is employed as a translator at the U.N. Secretariat.

Bouchard Holds Meeting

Leo Bouchard, a candidate in next week's selectmen race, and presently chairman of the town Democratic Committee, will be present at an open meeting about the town elections at 6 p.m. on Tuesday, Feb. 15 in room 802 of the Campus Center.

Mr. Bouchard, recently endorsed by John McGilvery, the UMass student candidate for the Board of Selectmen, and by Student Senate President Lee Sandwen, will discuss the reasons why the town elections should be important to the students.

Lee Sandwen noted, "that Mr. Bouchard was in large part responsible for facilitating the registration of 800 student voters through his help in convincing the Board of Electors to bring the town registration books on campus. He is committed to the broadest possible participation in politics by all citizens, and in particular has said he wants to guarantee that the town government will not overlook the interests of youth, students and the elderly."

According to Student Vote Committeewoman, Susan Roy, "All students registered at the polls in Amherst, as well as those interested in becoming voting citizens of the town are encouraged to attend this meeting, where hopefully they will be able to clarify their own feelings on the need for student participation in town government. I also encourage them to read the Friday issue of the Collegian, when polling times and places will be posted, along with a brief interview with each candidate for the Board of Selectmen, a listing of all other candidates and a few opinions on the importance of voting in the town elections."

Dames To Meet On Meat

The UMass Dames Club for the wives of students at the University will hold a "meat-buying session" at 8 p.m. Wednesday, February 16, at Farley 4-H Lodge. They ask that you come and learn how to be a wise shopper when it comes to choosing the best quality meats for your money. Mr. Harold Page, a butcher at Louis Foods, will show the difference between the various cuts of meat, and tell how they are best cooked and why there is such a big price range between these cuts. Bring your Dames I.D. card to the meeting. You may be the lucky winner of a Danish ham or other fine cut of meat.

If your present parking assignment is a hardship, you may appeal your assignment at 103 Hampshire House beginning February 15, 1972. There are a limited number of parking spaces available. The reassignment will be made consistent with the present point system.

Wood Sees 'New University' In '71 Report

Boston, Mass.--"We have the opportunity to fashion a great public university of a different character and mold than now exists in the United States," stated University of Massachusetts President Robert Wood in his annual report. The report "Shaping the Seventies" was released today in a 20-page publication that summarizes the 70-71 academic year at the Amherst, Boston and Worcester campuses of the University.

President Robert Wood looks thoughtful as he ponders his vision of the 'New University'.

Completing his first year in the post, President Wood keynoted the report by pointing to the University's formal transition in 1970-71 from a single geographic center to a statewide system with three major campuses.

The President added that the year was further marked by a 10% growth in enrollment to 25,634, new unprecedented capital construction, strengthened administration at the campus level, continuing innovation, and a widespread re-examination of University policies and goals.

President Wood then went on to outline the year's priorities. These consisted of coordinating the administrative operation of the statewide structure, appointing the University's first two vice-presidents, creating two new University-wide institutes: Institute for Labor Affairs and Institute for Governmental Services.

Another priority, the report said, was to strengthen the University's role in public-private university cooperation. In this area, President Wood reported new developments with the Five-College Program in the western part of the State. Further pledges of cooperation with the 20-institution Worcester Consortium, and continued exploration of the University's relationship with the eight large graduate institutions inside Route 128.

Another major priority was to identify the issues that will confront the University in this decade and the possible new directions and responses that will be required. This was charged to the specially appointed President's Committee on the Future University which, on Dec. 9, presented its far-reaching report.

Other highlights of the report:

--In Amherst: unprecedented growth hallmarked by a new campus center, a 28-story University library, and a 240-unit modular housing complex. Broadening of the academic experience: new curriculum offerings, expansion of advanced degree programs which awarded over 1,000 degrees on both the masters and Ph. D. levels, and greater involvement in student exchange programs with leading foreign universities, such as Oxford in England and Freiburg in Germany.

--At Boston: $130-million first-phase construction of the Columbia Point campus, plans for an experimental third college to emphasize education for public and community service, and an Institute for Learning and Teaching to assist inner-city teachers with special problems.

--At Worcester: two-year accreditation by the AMA, construction of a medical and health sciences complex, a special education program in community health, and affiliation with two Worcester hospitals.

The report indicated that these were only a few of the new directions UMass took in the past year. Also included were many programs oriented toward community service--from a regional-medical library in Worcester--to work in nutrition with disadvantaged families in 21 areas--to urban self-help projects in many communities.

"The new decade," Wood said, "calls us to a great exercise in imagination, energy and will. The stakes may well be the future of higher education."

Compromise Sought For Student Assistance Bills

By MARY GOODYEAR

The Higher Education Act of 1971, expected to be presented before Congress this month, will soon be the center of a House-Senate conference. The conference will be held to resolve important differences between two similiar education bills that have been passed by the Senate and the House separately.

One major difference that exists between the two is in the area of student assistance. The bill passed by the Senate in August emphasizes the right of every student, regardless of financial need, to obtain Federal support. The House bill passed in November authorizes for financial aid to be given to students according to need, hence maintaining the status quo.

Discrepancies can also be seen between the two bills in terms of the institutional support awarded to students. The Senate bill would authorize institutional financial assistance on the basis of the total undergraduate enrollment and the number of students receiving basic scholarship grants. The House formula takes into account the differing cost of education allowances, dependent upon the class status of the student. Unlike the House bill, that of the Senate authorizes emergency grants to colleges and universities in times of financial distress.

Among other differences are those of desegregation and sex discrimination. The House bill bars the use of funds for the busing of students and teachers at the elementary and secondary levels for the purposes of desegregation. The Senate bill does not have this condition, but would allocate funds for desegregation aid on the basis of the number of minority group children enrolled in each state's elementary and secondary schools.

The House bill bars sex discrimination in any educational programs receiving Federal funds, exempting, by a narrow vote, undergraduate admissions policies, thus enabling women's and men's colleges to receive Federal educational funds.

The amount of funding that student and institutional assistance, and desegregation would receive is not yet known. However, the 1972 Federal appropriation for education was well in excess of five billion dollars.

The existing legislation concerns these areas of education will terminate at the end of this fiscal year. Hence, some conciliation of the two bills is mandatory.

Civic Action Group Formed In Reaction To Amherst Bust

By KEVIN KEVIT

Controversy surrounding the drug-related arrests of five area individuals has recently led to the creation of an Amherst-based civic action group and the filing of a $100,000.00 civil suit against a local policeman.

The trial of the five, originally scheduled for Wednesday, has been postponed because tests to determine if the "drugs" confiscated by police are really of a narcotic nature have not yet been completed.

Ron Kosnicki, John Miller, Harry Gold, Chuck Volkman, and Lorrie Lyon were originally arrested last Halloween night in a van owned by Volkman. The van, parked on N. Pleasant St. near Augie's Tobacco Shop, was approached by Amherst police officer Edward Montleon, who requested Kosnicki to produce a driver's license and the vehicle's registration papers. The arrests occurred after Montleon found Kosnicki to be in the possession of what is assumed a small quantity of marijuana. Reportedly seized in a subsequent search of the van were marijuana, cocaine and LSD estimated by police to have a street value of about $2,200.00.

Because of alleged police malpractice in this incident, a group calling themselves the Bill of Rights Committee has formed in Amherst to assist in the defense of the five. Eric Walgren, a spokesman for the committee, stated that his group believes the arrest procedure used by Montleon constituted an act of illegal search and seizure. If it can be proven that the "narcotics" to be used as evidence against Kosnicki and the others were obtained illegally, all charges filed against the five would have to be dropped.

Stemming from this allegation of illegal police procedure, a separate, civil action has been filed in the name of John Miller seeking $100,000.00 in damages from Officer Montleon for false arrest and imprisonment. A request has also been submitted to the Amherst Civilian Review Commission for an investigation into the circumstances of the Halloween arrests.

When asked his opinion of the events surrounding the Kosnicki and Montleon cases, Amherst Deputy Police Chief Donald Maia replied that he had "no comment at this time."

In enumerating the specific points of contention that exist between the Bill of Rights Committee and the police, Walgren mentioned the fact that Miller claims to have had $6,000.00 cash in his possession at the time of his arrest, while the police, presently holding the money, only acknowledge receiving a sum slightly in excess of $4,000.00. Walgren explained the possession of such a large amount of money as incidental to a real estate deal Miller was allegedly to have negotiated in Boston.

When asked whether he thought the results of the upcoming trial of Kosnicki and the others would have any effect upon the outcome of the civil action against Montleon, Walgren stressed the individual nature of the two cases and stated that their results probably would not have any direct bearing upon each other. Walgren, saying that he had "seen too many cases go either way to be optimistic" about the chances of the five's being cleared in their upcoming trial, expressed a belief that "the Bill of Rights Committee has built itself up to where it's sitting on the brink of a movement. This scandal," he said, "could help bring about community control of police. I am enthusiastic about our progress in getting our grievances into the open."

Looking to the future, Walgren added, "I want the public to continue looking at the judicial system as a watchdog, to prevent the railroading of people like Miller."

Peace Liturgy At Westover Gate

The local Harrisburg Forty-Day Committee and Western Mass. Clergy and Laymen Concerned have announced that a "Guerrilla Liturgy" will be conducted at the Main Gate of Westover Air Force Base in Chicopee on Ash Wednesday, Feb. 16th, at 4:30 P.M. Several area clergy will take part in the penitential worship, which is called "An Act of Disaffiliation From Violence". The 45-minute service will include prayers, biblical readings, litanies, Fr. Daniel Berrigan's Catonsville statement, and the traditional distribution of ashes as a sign of penitence to mark the beginning of the Lenten season. The Greater Springfield Council of Churches Task Force For Peace is also a sponsor of this liturgy, which is the start of 40 days of intensive efforts by local religious groups to heighten public awareness as to the war in Indochina, as well as the anti-war conspiracy trial of Fr. Philip Berrigan and seven others in Harrisburg, Pa.

Nixon To Attempt Busing Halt

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon assured a group of congress members Monday he will try to offset the trend of federal court decisions requiring widespread busing of public-school children.

The chief executive did not commit himself to a specific course on the explosive political issue, a White House spokesman said.

But eight congressional sponsors of antibusing legislation or constitutional amendments said after a two-hour meeting with Nixon that the President made clear he will take specific steps, perhaps as early as next month.

Later, Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP, said of the meeting: "He ought to stay out of it altogether. It's very unseemly for the President of the United States to do this.

"He has no business calling together only the busing opponents and asking, 'What shall we do now?' in order to hold back 22 million black people who have millions of children in schools," Wilkins said in a Washington speech.

White House press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler said Nixon told the group of congressmen that, "We are not going to leave the situation as it is. We are looking for a remedy."

"The question is not identifying the problem," Ziegler added, "the question is how to proceed."

Three approaches were discussed--intervention by the attorney general in more court cases, legislation to ban use of federal funds for busing, or a constitutional amendment to prohibit assigning a student to a particular school because of his race.

Nixon long has been a critic of forced busing and arranged the meeting to discuss ways to offset recent rulings that require busing to achieve racial balance. At the session, Nixon did not indicate which of the three courses he preferred, said Robert P. Griffin, R-Mich.

"All three could go forward at the same time," Griffin said. And, he added, "the President does not feel he is limited to these three."

Instead, Griffin said, the President said he has formed a Cabinet-level committee to make an extensive study and report to him when he returns from China at the end of this month.

Ziegler said the committee--consisting of Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell, Secretary Elliot Richardson of Health, Education and Welfare and Director George Shultz of the Office of Management and Budget--has been in operation "for a long time" although its formation was not disclosed until Monday.

Ziegler would not predict a timetable for any presidential moves, but congressmen left the meeting with the impression that White House action could come during March while the House Judiciary Committee is holding hearings on the issue.

There are 28 different constitutional amendments pending in the House and Senate aimed at curbing busing. Also pending in the Senate is a set of House-passed additions to an eduucation bill to block use of federal funds for busing.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson, D-Wash., introduced a constitutional amendment Monday to prohibit mandatory busing of school children and to require equal educational opportunity for all children.

Jackson, who seeks the Democratic nomination for president, said he opposes forced busing but is also against "a system that gives a rich child a better public education than a poor child."

Ziegler said the objective of the Cabinet-level study is to obtain views of a broad spectrum of persons. He disclosed that the White House has been in contact with law professors and other legal experts.

World Chess Championship

AMSTERDAM (AP) — Bobby Fischer and Boris Spassky will decide the world championship of chess in a 24-game match divided between Belgrade, Yugoslavia, and Reykjavik, Iceland, the International Chess Federation announced Monday.

The first 12 games of the match between the American challenger and Soviet title-holder will be played in Belgrade beginning no later than June 25 and the final 12 in Reykjavik.

Danish Singer to Testify at Clifford Probe

NEW YORK (AP) — Danish beauty Nina van Pallandt's appearance before a federal grand jury probing Clifford Irving's purported "autobiography" of billionaire industrialist Howard Hughes was postponed Monday for lack of a quorum of jurors.

"Waiting is so tiresome, whether in a TV studio or here," said the 39-year-old blonde cabaret singer after she learned the jury session was put off until Tuesday.

Another Unmanned Probe Launched for Soviet Union

MOSCOW (AP) — The Soviet Union launched another unmanned moon probe, Luna 20, Monday and said its mission is "further exploration of the moon and near-moon space."

As usual in announcements of space shots, the official news agency Tass gave no details on how Luna 20 would do its exploring.

New Communication Satellite to Report China Trip

WASHINGTON (AP) — A new communications satellite went into operation Monday 22,300 miles in space--just in time to carry television and newspaper reports of President Nixon's visit to China.

There will be at least one ground station, and possibly two, to transmit live television and written stories of the visit that begins Feb. 21.

Snowstrom Delays Olympic Players Reception

CHICAGO (AP) — A snowstorm in Japan and a layover in Anchorage, Alaska, for customs inspection delayed the arrival of Northbrook's Olympic speed skaters and parades and receptions in their honor in Chicago and Northbrook, Ill., Monday.

Heath Faces Grave Industrial Crisis

LONDON (AP) — An avalanche of adversity has hit Prime Minister Edward Heath's government: Northern Ireland, unemployment, foreign policies in disarray--and now a coal miners' strike that has brought Britain's gravest industrial crisis in 46 years.

The strike has forced the nation's power plants into a giant switch-off for want of fuel. Industry slid into part-time work, threatening to double the country's one million unemployed. People shivered in their homes and offices.

For the first time in a year, Britain spent more abroad last month than it earned and the spreading dislocation of power-starved trade and industry brought the certainty of new setbacks.

A settlement more favorable to the miners looks inevitable and this would leave Heath's attempts to control inflation in jeopardy.

Reading the signs, investers began a wave of selling on London's stock market, slashing nearly $4 billion off the value of share prices.

In Northern Ireland, civil violence ground on amid fears that it could yet spill over into London where security has been tightened.

And in Dublin, to the south, the British Embassy was recently razed by demonstrators protesting the shooting of 13 Roman Catholic marchers during a civil rights parade broken up by British paratroops. Irish-British relations have slumped.

Abroad, the outlook seems bleak too with British foreign policies in disarray at some points.

Welfare Rolls Rise

WASHINGTON (AP) — The government said Monday an additional 70,000 persons joined welfare rolls in October but conceded inflated statistics were cited last month in a new pitch for the administration's welfare-reform bill.

The latest Department of Health, Education and Welfare report reflects the continuing impact of state relief cutbacks, in the face of rising costs, with more recipients receiving less money.

The lone exception is the state and locally operated general-assistance program, which dropped 35,000 recipients in September and another 15,000 in October for a one-month saving of almost $1 million.

General reliefers, who do not qualify for federal funds, now total 954,000 compared with more than one million a year earlier.

Cash welfare payments in October, latest figures available, showed a $2.7 million decrease to $857.8 million, the third straight monthly drop.

But total federal expenditures for all welfare assistance, including medical care, went up $100 million to nearly $1.58 billion to reverse a downward trend the previous two months.

An HEW spokesman blamed states for the inflated September figures cited last month when John D. Twiname, administrator of the Social and Rehabilitiation Service, renewed his plea for congresssional passage of welfare reform.

IRA Bombs Belfast

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) — Guerrilla bombers blasted more Belfast buildings Monday while Britain's chief judge opened an inquiry into the 13 deaths of Londonderry's "Bloody Sunday."

Bombs wrecked a Belfast bank, two downtown stores, a lumber yard and the Northern Ireland headquarters of Rank-Xerox, a British offshoot of American Xerox.

In Newry, close to the border with Ireland, gunmen broke into a Burmah Oil Co. depot and blew up tanks containing more than 100,000 gallons of oil and gasoline. Firemen prevented the blaze from spreading to other tanks.

Quick action to clear whole streets of shoppers and office workers prevented any casualties in the attacks.

Authorities blamed the raids on the outlawed Irish Republican Army, which is fighting to break Northern Ireland's links with Britain and merge the province with Ireland.

In Coleraine, a north coast university town, Britain's Lord Chief Justice Sir John Widgery opened a formal inquiry into the Jan. 30 killing of 13 men in Londonderry, Northern Ireland's second city.

Roman Catholic leaders charged they ... from indiscriminate shooting by ... troopers on a civil rights parade. The British say the soldiers shot in reply to sniping or nail bomb attacks.

A man found shot dead during the weekend was identified Monday as Pvt Thomas McCann of the Royal Army Ordnance Corps.

McCann, a 19-year-old Roman Catholic, was returning to his unit in Belfast from a weekend visit to Dublin to see his ailing mother, a widow, the British army said.

His death, the army added, bore the hallmarks of an IRA execution of a Catholic judged to be a "traitor" by serving with the British. He was found along a roadside, shot through the head, gagged with surgical tape and with a yellow paper sack over his head.

Allied Cease-Fire Detours Vietnam Bombing To Laos

SAIGON (AP)-The thrust of U.S. bombing raids turned from South Vietnam to Laos as a 24-hour allied cease-fire went into effect Monday night in observance of Tet, the Vietnamese lunar new year.

The allied cease-fire took effect at 6 p.m., bringing to a temporary halt to one of the biggest American bombing campaigns in South Vietnam in the war.

A unilaterally declared Viet Cong cease-fire took effect 17 hours before the one announced by the allies. The U.S. and South Vietnamese command refused to agree to the longer truce, saying the enemy command would use the cease-fire to infiltrate troops and supplies.

The always tenuous cease-fire was broken hours after it began, according to the allies, when the Viet Cong assassinated a hamlet chief and a soldier in the northern quarter of South Vietnam.

The joint military command also charged the Viet Cong with three other cease-fire violations.

U.S. B52 bombers, along with Navy and Air Force tactical fighter-bombers, flew more than 800 strikes in the six days before grinding down the massive air campaign at dusk Monday.

In a related development, the command said U.S. forces in Vietnam had fallen to 131,200 from the previous reporting period and the lowest level since August 1965.

At the same time, however, officers aboard 7th Fleet ships off the coast of Vietnam disclosed that Navy strength has been reinforced from an average of 10 ships to 16, including the aircraft carrier Constellation and support ships.

U.S. air and ground units clashed twice with enemy troops Monday morning and afternoon, the command reported. One American was wounded in the action on the ground six miles northeast of Cam Ranh Bay.

Most of the American air strikes flown during the past six days concentrated in the central highlands and in the northwestern quadrant of South Vietnam southward from the demilitarized zone though Khe Sanh and the A Shau Valley.

Despite the intensity of the air campaign, the U.S. Command has acknowledged few results.

Berrigan Juror Alternates Chosen

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP)-A grandfather and a middle-aged woman school teacher were added as prospective alternate jurors Monday at the slow-moving federal conspiracy trial of the Rev. Philip Berrigan and six other antiwar activists.

It brought to 11 the number tentatively chosen as backup jurors in the event of illness or disability on the regular panel. When the total reaches 16, it will be pruned to six, who will them join the regular jury for the trial's duration.

The grandfather now works for the Pennsylvania Department of Transportation, after 20 years with a furniture plant. His right hand is missing. He was not asked about it.

Regarding the Vietnam war, he said, "I feel the quicker we can get out, the better it would be for all concerned."

The teacher, a brown-haired mother of four sons, said of the war in Southeast Asia: "I don't feel we should have gone into it in the first place...I think we should withdraw."

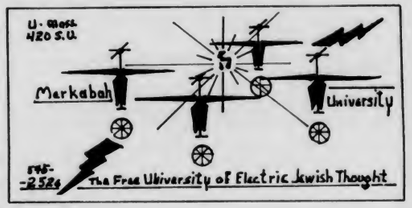
China Trade Barriers Chopped

WASHINGTON (AP)-President Nixon opened the door a bit wider Monday for trade with Communist China, putting it on an equal footing with the Soviet Union. And the White House announced a rough schedule of open-ended talks with Chinese leaders in Peking.

A relaxed schedule of sightseeing and a decision to permit President Nixon to ride in foreign aircraft for the first time during his China visit also was announced by the White House.

The relaxing of trade barriers and the special courtesies to the Chinese were announced three days before Nixon's departure for the People's Republic of China.



Press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler said the "across-the-board parity" in trade regulations for Communist China and the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries will pemit the flow of a larger number of non-strategic products into China.

It is a continuation of a relaxing of trade barriers begun last June, just before Nixon's national security adviser, Henry Kissinger made his secret trip to Peking to open the door to Nixon for summit talks with Chinese leaders after over 20 years of isolation.

"We would hope that the People's Republic of China will be receptive to this step to further open up communication with us," Ziegler said. He added "The door to trade has opened wider. We hope they would welcome this additional step forward..."

Under the new regulations, China will be able to import a long list of items, previously banned, including such things as locomotives, construction equipment, a variety of industrial chemicals, internal combustion engines and rolling mills.

In general, there currently are no restrictions on products China can send into the United States as a result of an initial easing of trade rules by Nixon last June.

More Good Than Bad

Now that the Joe Program is over most of us realize that it was, if not a total success, a valiant effort to break away from the wretched and dismal youth correctional system. The search for a new and effective means of treating juvenile offenders will be a long and arduous transition, a transition that Youth Service Commissoner Jerome S. Miller deemed necessary if the youths of Joe were to be saved the tragic consequences and accompanying recidivism rate of our present penal system.

For the students who were imposed upon or unduly inconvenienced by Joe we ask you to pause and look at the results of the program.

Of the 99 young men and women in Joe, 41 went back into their own homes, 11 were placed in foster care environments, 34 went to group homes such as Libra House, 7 were returned to institutions, and 6 youths were listed as runaways. Only 12 youths were included in any sort of trouble.

We realize your feelings of imposition and frustration can not be totally assuaged by the above. Yet we hope you realize the good that has come of the program and the hopes it raises throughout the country for new youth reform.

The Collegian realizes that the haste of organizing the program resulted in some poor planning and logistical deficiencies. Yet we expect the Youth Service Board to learn from this past experience and apply what they have learned here to their future programs. Consideration should be given to holding future programs on smaller campuses or in environments where there is a greater sense of community.

Finally, we believe that innovative programs like Joe should continue. Public support will be needed to continue the momentum. We ask that you give it.

What Price Popularity?

Senator Edward Kennedy stated this weekend that young men who fled the country to evade the draft should be granted amnesty without any preconditions. He said, "If we accept the concept and the understanding that the war was wrong, a mistake, then we must believe those who, because of deep-seated beliefs, fled the country were right." Senator Kennedy has stuck his foot in his mouth once again in an attempt to groom a more attractive, liberal image. His proposal strikes at the roots of an orderly society.

There are very few people who would not admit that U.S. involvement in the Vietnam war was a mistake. But to say that the war was a mistake does not imply that individuals were morally justified in ignoring their draft notices or deserting the ranks after having been inducted. As citizens of the society they were obligated to obey the laws which were instituted to protect and preserve that society. If they chose to ignore these laws and exercise their right of civil disobedience, they should be willing to endure the consequences of their actions. Socrates did not falter when he was faced with drinking the hemlock and Jesus did not fear the cross. They were men of superior moral fiber and their actions are deservingly recorded for all time. But the draft dodgers and deserters who chose to disobey the law and fled from the ensuing consequences are not of the same stuff: their composition reeks of cowardice, not courage.

Senator Kennedy is also suffering from the delusion that everyone who left the country to evade the draft or deserted from the armed forces did so because of "deep-seated beliefs." This is certainly false. More than half of the estimated 100,000 war evaders now in foreign countries must have developed a severe case of "deep-seated beliefs" when they received the piece of paper calling them to serve their country or booking them on the next flight to Vietnam. Besides, people who had deep-seated beliefs, and proved they did by living their lives by them, are given conscientious objector status and are not required to participate in military service.

The Kennedy proposal would serve to glorify those who acted out of personal expediency and ignored the laws, and place them a notch above the ordinary citizens who were loyal and fulfilled their obligations in accordance with the laws, no matter how demanding these obligations were. Obviously, the Senator believes that it is superior for one to obey the laws only when he feels like it. This doesn't seem too surprising when one examines the Senator's personal history.

The ultimate absurdity is that Kennedy feels that his proposal will unite the country. How can he possibly unite the country with a scheme that encourages individuals to disobey the law and ignore the consequences of their actions, while betraying the thousands of soldiers who fought and died courageously in the service of their country? It seems that Senator Kennedy's only purpose is to outflank his contemporaries on the left who have come up with proposals on the same matter. Senator Robert Taft, Jr. (R-Ohio) has offered a bill which would clear draft dodgers provided they give the country three years of alternate public service. Senator Edmund Muskie of Maine and Mayor John Lindsay of New York have both endorsed plans which would grant conditional amnesty to war evaders after the conflict in Vietnam is over.

These proposals seem much more reasonable than the Kennedy plan. I only hope that the other members of the Senate subcommittee which Kennedy heads on this matter do not allow his plan to undermine the basis of American society in his attempt to score political points.

Publicity Stunt

By JOE ARSENAULT

Howard Hughes, the new chameleon of the seventies refuses to disappear graciously; no, before he gives up a last breath, he will have himself become even more of a household word than the latest soap opera intrigue. In fact, the whole air of this literary controversy raging in the news lately has trumped-up melodrama at its very core. In his meagre life, Hughes has owned and disowned half of Nevada, has used and reused some of America's most nostalgic screen queens, has even relinquished the giant eagle of the airlines, TWA, and then proudly unproclaimed himself as the shattered eccentric hermit of the oppressed executive set. In his days, HH has more than accomplished the American Dream. In the fiction or autobiographical story of those adventures, he fans a smoke screen to make it more fantastic, so unreal as to make it the new myth of the time. McGraw-Hill in collusion with Irving and Hughes will resurrect the dream only to desecerate its memory.

Clifford Irving, upon whose shoulders rests this fantastic parlor trick, is being accused of writing "a plaethara of lies and half truths, of being reckless, malicious. His work is a gloating, prancing distortion that is irresponsible to the extreme." (Camps are being established--have you chosen sides yet, or are waiting for the victor so that you can herald him as the next prophet?) What amazes me is the seriousness that this issue seems to take in the minds of many people. I suppose that this negative criticism, these ripe histrionics, this literary theatre will pump the sales, catapulting the novel to the top of the bestseller list, that HH, Irving, and McGraw-Hill will make greater fortunes, while the feeble minds will swallow this myth, drooling aimlessly and dreamily over their new god. The whole situation has the phony look of a dyed blonde with her roots blaring in the sunlight.

Laugh at them, or be made a fool of them. I almost want to say don't buy the book that will only support their fantasy. I'm so curious to find out what it's all about that probably, in a back corner somewhere, I'll be reading it, too. C'est la vie!

Don't Wait Till November

By MARY LAVIN, SMC

The Student Senate's refusal to fund the Student Mobilization Committee did not seem to result as much from a lack of sympathy with the Mobe and the antiwar movement as from a lack of full comprehension of the power of the SMC.

The Mobe ran up against many arguments while fighting for next year's budget. Accusations such as those that Mobe is pro-war and run by an elitist group are totally ridiculous and fallacious and do not need to be refuted. However, far more disturbing were the statements made by senators that they wanted an SMC on campus but didn't think it should be funded by the University. Their reasoning failed to see that considering the nature of our work, Mobe could not possibly exist without funding.

How could we have written up (and distributed) somewhere around 50,000 leaflets since September, 6,000 of which went to the surrounding communities of Amherst, Hadley, Northampton, and Greenfield? How could we have printed (and pasted up) hundreds of posters? How could we have shown "The Selling of the Pentagon" at our October 13th Teach-In? How could we have had national antiwar spokespersons speak at open meetings?

All this and so much more requires money. We are asking the Senate for this money because, unlike the vast majority of funded RSO groups, the SMC reaches everyone and involves everyone. We are not a self-contained organization; we work for you and we invite you--every single person on this campus who wants an immediate, total, and unconditional withdrawal of all troops from Southeast Asia--to come to our meetings and help us realize that goal.

The tactic used by the SMC is mass peaceful legal demonstrations--the banding together of all people who oppose the war, resulting in moral support for each other and political pressure on politicians. No one, I think, would say that the only reason Nixon began making troop withdrawals was because of the million people demonstrating on April 24. Yet, no one, I think, could say that that wasn't a major reason. Students are noted as being the most active segment of society and the Student Mobilization Committee is the largest student antiwar group in the country. Therefore, it is with some justice that we take credit for helping force Nixon to make those withdrawals. Still, the SMC does not discourage individuals who want to work on their own in opposing the war in other ways, from civil disobedience to democratic processes, as long as they also support mass demonstrations. We need each other. We need every single person who wants OutNow to work with the Mobe to get Out Now, regardless of what the other side of your political life is like.

This is an election year. So many people will want to sit back and "wait till November". Nixon will want to sit back and "wait till November". But November is one hell of a long time away--especially when you're in Indochina in a war that everybody at home would like to forget about. Vote in November if you want to--fine, but the war is too serious an issue to be resolved by placing all your confidence in your one little X on the ballot. This April has the potential for larger than ever demonstrations because: 1. people have seen the accomplishments of last April and 2. we are all one year sicker of the war and more anxious to end it once and for all. A giant concerted effort could be a final effort.

UMass has been called a "hotbed of apathy". The people who stayed till 3:00 AM the morning of the October 13th Teach-In mimeographing and stapling 10,000 two-sided leaflets, the more than 200 people who attended that Teach-In, the 40 people who helped us distribute leaflets afterwards, the two busloads of students who traveled with us to Boston on November 6th, the numerous people who come by the SMC table and up to the office to see what's going on--all this tells me otherwise. UMass if far from being a radical school, but the students here definitely are concerned. The SMC is the only political group requesting Senate funds. Right now, Mobe needs the Senate, but equally, the Senate and the whole University need Mobe. Please reconsider the vote to fund the Student Mobilization Committee.

Letters To The Editor

There Is No Justice

To the Editor:

We are local people who are fed up with continuous police abuse violating the rights of ourselves and our neighbors. We have formed the Bill of Rights Committee to protect ourselves. Here is our plan:

Documenting Police Abuse

We shall write a book documenting local police abuses. Some chapters will be Drug Busts, Street Abuses, Station House Abuses, Foul Play in Court, Bad Treatment in Jail and Total Fuck-Overs,

Proposal for Community Control of Police

We have drafted a 10 point proposal to control local police, at U. Mass and in the Town. Community controlled police departments are not pipe dreams, because (1) of the unusual concentration of young potential voters in this town, and because (2) of the tremendous political pressure students can bring to bear on the Chancellor of the University, Mr. Bromery. The resulting political pressure on the County Prosecutor Callahan to keep hands off our lives would also be impressive.

Court Actions Against Police

For the first time in the history of this Town we are suing an Amherst policeman for the abuse of young people--an illegal search and seizure of 2 marijuana cigarettes.

On Oct. 31, 1971 at about 9:00 p.m. Amherst patrolmen Edward R. Montleon arbitrarily demanded the driver of a van parked on Main St. to produce his license and registration. At the same time Ron Kosnicki produced his license, the officer reached under the flap and into the pocket of Ron's army jacket and snatched a plastic baggie containing his personal supply of marijuana. John Miller, Laurie Lyons, Harry Gold, and Chuck Volkman were all arrested for "being knowingly present". This is plain violation of the 4th Amendment right to privacy. (This is what we mean by a "pig.") Because of the work of the Bill of Rights Committee, John Miller is suing the Officer and the Town of Amherst for $100,000 for false arrest and imprisonment.

We have just learned that when the police seized $6000 of Miller's cash they stole nearly $2000. We have put this official corruption before the Town Ombudsman, Mr. Gage (Vice-Chancellor of U. Mass.) We know there is no justice in Callahan's office.

Future Plans

We intend to pursue (1) criminal defenses for future police abuses. (2) More civil suits for damages and injunction of police malpractices. (3) Massive voter registration and (4) political action within and without the system to gain community control of the police.

What You Can Do

(1) Tell us your story of personal police abuse. (2) Support us financially according to your means. (3) Sign up to work with the committee on our various projects. New projects welcome.

Join together at John Miller's criminal trial. Come to Superior Court, Northampton, this wed. at 9:30 a.m. Demonstrate out fron and fill the gallery inside (the law required jackets and ties for men, pantsuits for women.)

Find us at our table in the Campus Center or mail to: Bill of Rights Committee, Universal Life Church, RSO # 902, Campus Center of U.Mass., Amherst, Mass. 01002.

Drafted: Eric Walgren, edited: John Miller, Robin Steere, Gail Sullivan, Gus Tengberg, Susan Wood.

Who And How

To the Editor,

As we all know there are many fees which all of us have to pay in order to register. One of these is the Campus Center fee. After reading Mr. Densmore's letter in the Collegian yeaterday I feel that his position should be criticised. It is true that the building is already built and that there is nothing anyone can do about that. But the question to be asked, as Mr. Densmore himself says, who should have control over the funds and more importantly, how is the building to be funded?

I will not quarrel about who should control the funds because I feel that it is too big a job for a full time student to adequately control. The present system works well in making operational decisions The difficult question is who should fund the Campus Center?

No one can deny that the sutdents receive most of the benefits of the first two floors. The lower level is used extensively by R.S.O. groups as well as by the Student Senate. This is not to say that its exclusive use is by students for I have seen many outside interests using the conference rooms. The concourse level is probably the most used floor by students. The University store, the Bluewall Cafeteria, the music room, and the snack bar area are used mainly by students. But these two floors are not the only two floors in the building for, if they were, then we would have no complaint about the student fee.

The problem lies mainly in the fact that the Campus Center consists of eleven floors. The hotel lobby and four floors of hotel rooms do not constitute "services" necessary for a "complete educational system" as Mr. Densmore points out. Next comes two floors of meeting rooms which are, to some extent, used by students. The tenth floor consists of a private banquet room and, although I can forsee some use of it by students, I find it unnecessary for a complete educational system. Restaurant facilities on the eleventh floor, more commonly called the Top of the Campus, are much beyond the means of the average student to warrant its construction for their benefit.

The point I am trying to make about all this is simply that the students singly haul more than their share of the costs. What is the answer to this question? It would be ideal if those who use the facility would pay their share of the dept as well as part of the operating costs involved in their use of the building. But this is highly impractical because higher costs mean lower demand and if the conferences were not held here it would be worse than it is now. So as a solution I propose that the faculty and professional staff, who also enjoy the benefits of our building, help us to pay for the Campus Center. A fee could be levied in some way determined by the people in Whitmore. If according to Mr. Densmore we are responsible for our current problem then it should be up to us, as students, to correct the situation as best we can. Don't let the issue die as Mr. Densmore suggests.

Editorial Points

It looks as though Clifford Irving read his own book a little too closely. Maybe in ten years someone will write a book about him and call it "Faked."

While the fight goes on about who should pay for the Campus Center at what yearly rate, we're just wondering if the money they have now could be used to repair the ever-present leaks on the concourse level. Maybe the building came with a five year guarantee?

Do you suppose that D.H. Jones is a relative of Skibiski?

According to the N.Y.Times, Nixon's Commission on Marijuana and Drug Abuse has "decided use of the drug should be Virtually 'decriminalized' except for growing it, transporting it, smoking it in public or giving it to friends. Somehow it seems as though "decriminalization" is going to take all the fun out of smoking dope. Almost.

Setting A Good Example

To the Editor:

One night last week, I went to visit a friend in the Sylvan area and was quite amazed at what I saw. It was past eleven o'clock, and the security guard came to open the door for me. He asked me whom I wanted to see and instructed me to call my friend on the phone and ask that he come down to escort me to his room.

I was not upset at the guard's instructions per se, for this was only part of the normal routine. However, I was disgusted with his guard's tactics--i.e. the manner in which he told me to call upstairs. He was abrupt, gruff, snappy, and quite frankly, very intimidating, as I stood there, he seemed to speak in a belligerent tone to all who came into the lobby (residents included). I was thoroughly dismayed at the negative approach this guard used while enforcing the rules.

Therefore, I consider it only appropriate to inform you of our security guard in Eugene Field House. Maybe you've seen him before: tall, husky, middle-aged, and always a smile. When one comes in after eleven o'clock (dorm residents or just visitors), he unlocks the door and greets the traveller warmly. Then one comes down to buy pizza, he is always there chatting with some of the residents. He's truly an all-around pleasant guy, and is admired by everyone.

I think our security guard set an example for all others on campus. He has created a casual atmosphere in Field that is probably unmatched in any other dorm. He has maintained a good security check while at the same time establishing a comfortable setting for all residents. Most importantly, he has earned the goodwill and esteem of all who have met him.

Indeed, he has set a norm toward which all other security guards should strive. Adoption of his approach by the entire security force will not only bring respect to the other guards, but will also create a more pleasant community in which to live.

What Can We Do

To the Editor:

The recently reported U.S. buildup in the Gulf of Tonkin should come as no great surprise to the students both here and abroad, as the American governmental-industrial stakes in Southeast Asia are both apparent and covert. For example, the Wall Street Journal and several trade publications have confirmed that very lucrative off-shore oil leases will be awarded by the Thieu government, and as a backdrop, we have a president in office whose campaign was largely funded by the oil industry.

The oil rich islands of Indonesia have long been major attractions to the petroleum people of America, but it was not until the overthrow of Sukarno who tried to maintain control over his country's resources, that the stage was set for act one in the continuing Death Opera called Southeast Asia off-shore exploration.

Did the U.S. promote the Cambodian coup of General Lon Nol in the same manner as that of General Suharto of Indonesia, and does Nixon continue to support Thieu's actors' guild to pave the way for oil interests?

The major question is how far will the president go! In attempting to evaluate this proposition, it may be wise to remind ourselves of a public statement made by Nixon as vice-president in 1955:

"It is foolish to talk about the possibility that the weapons which might be used in the event war breaks out in the Pacific would be limited to the conventional Korean and World War II types of explosives. Our forces could not fight an effective war in the Pacific with those types of explosives if they wanted to. Tactical atomic explosives are now conventional and will be used against the military targets of any aggressive force."

What can we do to help prevent such a possibility? Someone may say it can't happen, but would that person say that with true conviction if living the life of a Vietnamese peasant?

Should we help the Administration discredit the Peace Movement through active non-involvement and militant apathy, or should be employed. Several anti-war coalitions exist, including the National Peace Action Coalition whose main attempt is to unite as many people as possible around opposition to the War irrespective of their views on other questions and regardless of their affiliations. Besides this principle of non-exclusion, the stated basis of the coalition is immediate withdrawal, peaceful legal tactics, mass demonstrations, political non-partisanship and internal democracy (periodic open conferences). Included within this framework are such diverse groups as Vietnam Veteran Against the War and the Student Mobilization Committee.

As a vet, I was proud to be in the company of VVAW brothers during the Veterans' Day march in Springfield last year, but as a senator, I was disheartened to find myself in the minority on the important budget question concerning the SMC.

"What can we do" will be answered by UNITING to dismantle the War and Death by reinstating the Mobe's budget for '72-'73. (It won't be needed if the barbarism ends).

What is W.M.P.I.R.G.

— A student-run, funded, directed, non-partisan, non-profit organization.
— A full-time representation of student/citizen concerns.
— A professional staff working for students.
— Comprehensive research serving as a basis for responsible action.
— Faculty/student programs of public interest research for credit.

Why a Petition — Drive?

1) UMass has never had a majority of its student body vote in any campus election, much less approve a question by an absolute majority. If W.M.P.I.R.G. is able to claim the support of a majority of students, a new method to demonstrate student support is necessary. Petitioning is the best method.

2) The petition referendum provides a one-to-one encounter. W.M.P.I.R.G. organizers wanted the opportunity to explain the W.M.P.I.R.G. concept to as many students as possible. The petitioning process gives each an opportunity to ask questions and discuss the idea.

3) A successful petition drive will serve as a student mandate which can be presented to the Board of Trustees.

Why the Funding and Refunding Procedure?

W.M.P.I.R.G. will be financed by a $2.00/per semester per student refundable tax attached to the semester bill. During the first three weeks of the semester any student may easily obtain a refund. The continuous and stable operation of a professional staff requires a stable funding source. A check-off system on the semester bill would be too slowly processed and would involve an expensive, major change in the billing procedure. New students will learn about W.M.P.I.R.G. at the beginning of the fall semester, at which time they can decide its value.

There will be no tax and no W.M.P.I.R.G. if a substantial majority of students do not sign petitions indicating their desire to see it put into effect.

Nader-Raider Donald Ross

will speak at 9:00 p.m. Tuesday, Feb. 15

in the Engineering East Aud.

to all interested in W.M.P.I.R.G.

all W.M.P.I.R.G. course members, and petitioners, should attend.

Selective Service Appeals System Altered

By GILBERT J. SALK

There are many faults which are built in to the Selective Service System, most of which are totally intolerable, as you well know. One thing which has always been in its favor, however, has been the appeal system. Now, even this minor good point has been seriously curtailed, while the trappings in which it is clothed have been made more attractive.

The clothing first: You now have the right to bring up to three witnesses to testify in your behalf as any personal appearance before your local board. Prior to the new regulations, you were denied the right to present any witnesses, although some local boards allowed you the privilege. Barring unusual circumstances, though, you are limited to a total of 15 minutes to present your total case before the board. If you divide this time between yourself and three witnesses, it is apparent that nobody gets a chance to say much.

As a result, you should press for a longer interview, and get them to verbally refuse to give you the time needed to present your strongest possible case. Such a statement on their part could win a higher appeal for you.

The new rules continue to deny you the right to an attorney at an appeal. This should obviously be fought in court, and it surely will be. In the meantime, you may not present a lawyer before your board except as a personal witness; he may not appear as an attorney.

The new regs also permit you to make an appearance before the State Appeal Board. This is a first, and an important one. Previously, most appeal boards did not read your file; they merely worked from a summary sheet prepared by a clerk--a distinctly illegal practice, but one hard to prove.

Now, however, they will have to take more time with your case because they will be dealing with you personally. This should provide an instant bottleneck in the entire SSS if all of you refuse to accept unsatisfactory classifications and exercise all of your appeal rights. It could even cause the whole system to bring to a halt. Keep that in mind if you ever get a 1-A you don't want.

You are not allowed witnesses before the state board, but it would be to your advantage to request permission to bring on (or more) and have them refuse. They would again be denying you an opportunity to present your strongest possible case.

There is one very important point you should be sure to remember. Under the new regs, you will only be given 15 days from the date your classification is mailed to file an appeal. Note: It is not from the date you receive the classification, but the date on which it is mailed. This fact makes it urgent that you ensure that your board has your current mailing address. If the letter gets lost, or is delayed, you are the loser. Once the 15 days is past, you are considered to have surrendered your right to appeal the classification, even if you did not receive the notice. It is a difficult, and by no means sure, job to persuade the board that it should reopen your case after the deadline has gone by.

You must act quickly. If at any time you receive a classification you don't want, or don't understand, see a draft counselor immediately. If for some reason a counselor is not available, send an appeal letter to your board at once, and then, if the appeal later proves unneccessary, you can withdraw the appeal. As the old cliche says, it is indeed better to be safe than sorry. As with all correspondence with draft boards, you should send your appeal letter by Certified Mail Return Receipt Requested, and keep a copy for your files. The board will have to sign for the letter, and the Post Office will return the receipt to you, giving you proof the board received it, and when.

Now look. The old regs allowed 30 days for an appeal. Most people knew about the time limit and acted within it, but some didn't. Relatively few know that the time has been cut in half, and a great many folks will get fucked over by the change. So please, make sure that your friends know about it. If they're on campus, tell them to read this column; if they're at home or some other school, write them and tell them to pass the word.

Without cannon fodder, the war machine has to rust away. And if you carefully exercise all of your rights, you don't gotta go.

PEACE.

Civil Liberties To Hold Open Meeting

The Civil Liberties Union of Hampshire County will hold a meeting open to the public on Tuesday, February 29, in the Main Lecture Hall at Hampshire College. The purpose of the meeting is to discuss the activities of the Chapter and new ways it might go.

The principal speaker of the evening will be Mr. Spencer Coxe, Executive Director of the Civil Liberties Union of Philadelphia, who will speak on Civil Liberties when the Mayor is a Cop. Mr. Coxe has lead the Philadelphia chapter in its defense of the rights of many individuals and groups during the tensions of recent years in Philadelphia.

Following the address there will be a series of workshops to discuss ways in which the Chapter can work with prisons, women's rights, schools, and problems of local government including the police and the courts.

by SYDNEY OMARR

A reader named Carol, from Manassas, Va., writes to inform me that I have "done it again." What I have done, according to Carol, is to once more extol the virtues of Leo. Carol declares that, as far as she is concerned, those born under this zodiacal sign are "arrogant, loud, pushy, gossipy and back-stabbing." Your opinions, please!

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Deception is invited if you procrastinate. You are not without allies. Let others know it. Speak up. Then volunteer efforts in conjunction with hospital, charitable organization. Get signatures on dotted line.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Friends argue about money. Don't get caught in middle. Adhere to principles, but try to be impartial. By sharing knowledge, you make significant gains. Ensure happiness by rising above jealousy.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Those who put up big front are bluffing. Know this-respond accordingly. Stress versatility. Have alternatives at hand. One who is in position of authority is inclined to back you.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): It may be difficult to stick to facts, but now it is necessary. Don't try to play games with truth. Accent is on how you respond to studies, messages, long-distance calls. Aquarius plays prominent role.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You tend now to carry a torch. Key is to live for today, not yesterday. You will understand. Welcome change, for it will prove beneficial. Member of opposite sex is involved. Give logic equal time with emotions.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Domestic adjustment is a necessity. You may be making something out of nothing. Give mate, partner full rein. Lie low. Gain shown if you are a careful, shrewd observer. Put off signing of legal document.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Don't insist, force or cajole. Take it easy. See situation as it exists, not as you wish it might be. Avoid trying to do too much at once. Let others show their hands. Play conservative game. Wait and see.

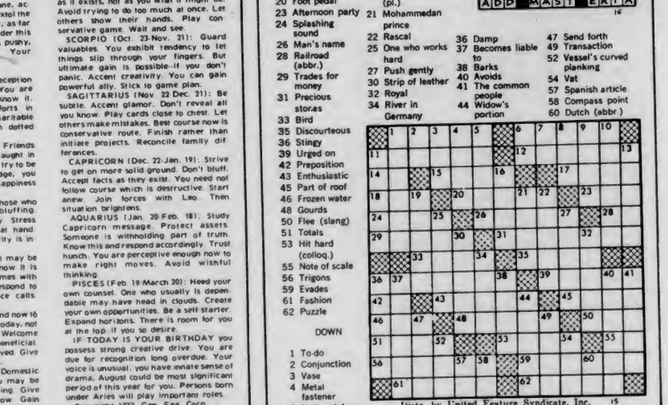
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Guard valuables. You exhibit tendency to let things slip through your fingers. But ultimate gain is possible-if you don't panic. Accent creativity. You can gain powerful ally. Stick to game plan.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Be subtle. Accent glamor. Don't reveal all you know. Play cards close to chest. Let others make mistakes. Best course now is conservative route. Finish rather than initiate projects. Reconcile family differences.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Strive to get on more solid ground. Don't bluff. Accept facts as they exist. You need not follow course which is destructive. Start anew. Join forces with Leo. Then situation brightens.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Study Capricorn message. Protect assets. Someone is withholding part of truth. Know this and respond accordingly. Trust hunch. You are perceptive enough now to make right moves. Avoid wishful thinking.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Heed your own counsel. One who usually is dependable may have head in clouds. Create your own opportunities. Be a self-starter. Expand horizons. There is room for you at the top-if you so desire.



IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you possess strong creative drive. You are due for recognition long overdue. Your voice is unusual; you have innate sense of drama. August could be most significant period of this year for you. Persons born under Aries will play important roles.

Long Weekend For Swimmers

WPI Nips Men

By JANIS AHMADJIAN

"What can you say after an extremely close, frustrating, highly competitive meet which your team just lost by a few points?" "They did a good job." "They dropped their times." "A new school record was set." "There will be other meets." Last Thursday night the UMass Varsity Swim Team lost their big meet of the semester to W.P.I. 59-54, in what had to be the most exciting and yet the most frustrating swim meet of the season. UMass held the lead throughout the meet until the last fateful event which proved to be their downfall.

Winning confidence was high at the start of the competition, especially when George Kwiecien, Dave Guiney, Tom Smith, and Jim Cinamon won the first event, the 400 yard Medley with a team of 4:23.6.

The really high point of the meet was when Ian Emberson, a new swimmer for the team, placed a new UMass record in the 1,000 yard Freestyle with a record breaking time of 12:38.5 minutes. This was the first time he had every swum the long, grueling event; his only other distance swimming being a two mile open ocean race in Hawaii. Ian wanted to be of use to the team in competition and he certainly achieved it.

Joe Hebert continued this winning streak as he placed first in the 200 yard Freestyle, time 2:03.

The score was 15-10 for UMass when the fast 50 yard Freestyle came up and Dick Blaisdell placed first with a time of 23.8 seconds with Pete Ouellette taking second.

In the next event UMass again placed a first. Bob Okolita did it in the 200 yard Individual Medley with a time of 2:21.7. while Captain Herb Schuster gained a third place.

The score was 34-18 for UMass as the first Diving Competition began. Team spirit and confidence were high especially after diver Mike Queen took a first place win.

Tom Smith placed second in the 200 yard Butterfly. Brad Hulme is a new swimmer for UMass in this event.

The Blaisdell/Ouellette combination did well again in the 100 yard Freestyle. Dick Blaisdell placed first with his best time of the season 52.3 seconds while Pete Ouellette got a third.

In the 200 yard Backstroke Bob Okolita placed second and George Kwiecien third bringing the score for UMass up to 47-32.

W.P.I. started to gain though in the next two events. Ian Emberson got a second in the 500 yard Freestyle and Dave Guiney a third in the 200 yard Breast stroke.

The score was still for UMass 51-46 at the start of the second Diving Competition, but, much depended on the success of the two remaining events. As it turned out W.P.I. performed some fantastic dives. Mike Queen gained a second for UMass. However, this just wasn't enough to pull the team out of danger.

Everything depended on the last event, the 400 yard Freestyle Relay; one team would get all the points and the other team none. The race was one of the most agonizing things to watch as each team strove to finish first. It was extremely close and fast, but, UMass just wasn't fast enough to win.

W.P.I. won the meet 59-54 proving that in sports you can't always predict the victor until all the competition is over. Close, keen, aggressive competition certainly characterized this meet along with the sharp disappointment of defeat.

Saturday afternoon the team lost to Coast Guard 66-37. Next meet of the semester is when UMass hosts Tufts Wednesday at 4:00 p.m. in Boyden Pool.

Ski Team Successful

Snow conditions for the Tufts Slalom at Bromley in Vermont were excellent being a combination of man made and natural snow on a very hard base. The first 50 gate slalom was an ideal 45 seconds in length, but it was not very rhythmical and had some hard cranking turns which were hard to negotiate.

UMass was skiing in 8th position and Co-captain Tuck Woodruff in the first seed on number 8 bib "wiped out" badly but finished with a 90.6 more than twice the time for a good run. Jerry Curran in the next seed on 16 bib socked in a good time of 47.7 seconds. Too many people were falling so Kurt Syer on bib 24 in the third seed brought in a good 48.0 and Dave Rutter had a conservative 52.1 while Dick McWade had a sound 49.6 rounding out four good but not great times for UMass. If Dave Ferris could have a good one, then the team would have a margin of safety for the second run, but he fell, but not as badly as Tuck and he had a 61.3-not good but not hopeless. In the meantime, Boston College and Northeastern were out-skiing the Redmen. BC had a best four times of 195.8 and six men standing while Northeastern had a 196.1 to UMass's third place of 197.4. In third place with two men virtually out of it, it looked as though UMass was not as good at slalom as at giant slalom. The second run proved otherwise since the four men who stood up in the first run skied a second good slalom. Curran had a two run time of 95.8 for 9th place. Kurt Syer had a two run time of 95.5 for the best team performance and a 7th place. Dick McWade put two good ones together for a 97.8 and 13th place. Dave Rutter's two solid runs for a 102.3 had a 17th place. This added up to a team time of 391.4, BC was close with a 391.7 while NU had a 395.0 and BU had a 417.7. Other teams in order of finish were AIC, Amherst, Tufts and Bentley.

Ken Biederman of BU won the race, Dick Gannon of NU was second and Andy Wernick of Tufts was third. UMass did not have great individual performances, but the team second round performance was outstanding and the win loss ratio stands at one loss to 35 wins.

Rain was predicted for Sunday and the snow was warmer and very different. Some of the early runners broke through the top hard snow to softer snow below and giant ruts quickly developed. To compound problems a very heavy "pea soup" fog crawled in and visibility was less than two giant slalom gates. The fog was so thick that there was some talk of cancelling the race, but it lifted some and the race went on while the ruts grew deeper.

In the first run Tuck Woodruff had a good 63.5, Jerry Curran had a 66.4, Kurt Syer fell two gates from the finish and had a 78.7, Dave Rutter had a 67.5 and Dick McWade had a 68.1 while Dave Ferris fell. With four men standing with a total time of 265.9, the Redmen were in third place behind Northeastern with a 264.2 and BC with a 265.7.

The ruts were so deep that a second giant slalom had to be set. Mother Nature decided that everything ought to be new so she lifted the fog and turned on a hard snow storm. With new snow the track was much faster. In the second run the right four men stood up to give a good team performance. Good enough to beat BC, but not enough to down Northeastern. In the second run Woodruff had a fast one to give a two run time of 120.2 to finish second in the race. Dick Gannon of NU won it with a 119.2. "Wise old racer" Jerry Curran, not skiing as well as usual, got a total time of 128.2 and an 11th place over all. Dick McWade had a very fast second run of 60.5 seconds, but with his slower first run, finished with a 129.0 and 13th place. Dave Rutter gave his usual solid team performance and finished with a 131.2 and 20th place in the race. These were good performances good enough to finish second in the race. Northeastern had a total team time of 501.7 for the best four, UMass had a 508.6, BC had a 509.8, NU had a 522.5, Tufts had a 525.7, Amherst 574.1, Bentley 612.0 and AIC finished last with a 644.5.

Girls Lose

A stronger, more experienced University of Vermont team overcame the UMass Women's Swim Team 76-28 Friday night.

Vermont held the lead right from the start. Though, UMass gained many second and third places, these just couldn't equal the first Vermont constantly captured.

-Claire Briana placed second in the 200 yard Freestyle and the 500 yard Breast stroke.

Freshman Laurie Seluk placed a close second in the 50 yard Freestyle with a time of 28.5 seconds. She also grabbed seconds in the 50 yard Butterfly and the 100 yard Individual Medley.

Senior Jan Reid gained third place wins in the 50 yard Butterfly, 100 yard Freestyle, and 100 yard Breast stroke.

Roxanne LaCoste placed third in the 50 yard Backstroke and the 100 yard Backstroke.

Mary Beth Stanne grabbed a third in the 100 yard Individual Medley.

Junior Sue White gained a second in the Diving Competition and a second in the 50 yard Backstroke.

Sideline highlight of the meet was noted Coach Silvia of the Varsity Men's Swim Team at Springfield College who came to watch his daughter compete for Vermont.

Many of the UMass swimmers dropped their times and the team is preparing for competition with URI Wednesday and the Albany Invitationals Saturday.

Runners Lose

By SANDY LAWN

Hopes for a Redman upset faded fast Saturday as Northeastern swept 10 of 13 events to smooch UMass 78-31. The Redmen, now 1-3, managed to win the 50 yard hurdles as Jim Graves set a new NU cage record of 6.5 seconds. Their other two victories came in the mile and two mile relays.

Asked about the loss, Coach Ken O'Brien said that NU had "no weak spots" and that the Redmen "got seconds and thirds in places we needed firsts and seconds". The score certainly could have been a lot closer with a little luck. In the two mile race, Mike McCusker, Doug O'Connell, and Bill Gillin of UMass were running in a pack with NU's Larry Joseph until the last lap when Joseph pulled ahead and won with a 9:12. McCusker and O'Connell finished second and third and Gillin took a fourth with a new frosh mark of 9:20.5.

Another bad break was in the high jump where Mark Hughes cleared the same height as the winner, Brennanof, NU, but only got second because Breenan had fewer misses. O'Brien also had praise for milers Rick Barry and Randy Thomas who got third and fourth and long jumper Steve Bradley who captured a third. UMass also looked good in the pole vault where John Kamp and Dennis Lombardo got second and third.

Grapplers Keep Rolling

By JOHN BOCK

It isn't often, in any sport, that three teams have a chance at upsetting a top ranked team on the same day. Three wrestling teams had such a chance on Saturday at Storrs, Connecticut. Out of this triple threat to UMass' Number 1 ranking in the NEIWA came only the reaffirmation of the fact that the Redmen aren't Number 1 because they don't know how to wrestle, as the grapplers registered a clean sweep of the squad.

Daily Collegian

The chief threat came in the form of the Rams of URI, the third ranked team in the NEIWA and the only team, other than UMass, to come close to beating Springfield. URI boasted a team that derived its strength from veterans that had come though last year's New Englands in fourth place. In addition the Rhode Island recruiting program had been particularly successful in obtaining some fine wrestlers out of New York, a few from the same school as UMass Captain Shelley Goldberg.

The 118 pound match was a thriller, for a while, as it wrestled New England Runner Up, Dave Amato, against the Rams third place winner Rich Adham. After a first period that saw Amato get taken down and immediately reverse his opponent, things started to pick up and when Amato put them down he was the 9-3 winner of the bout.

Barry Godowsky was aggressive on his feet and had Mark Pressman in a lot of trouble many times but only found himself at the edge of the mat and without a takedown. Once Pressman got ahead he stayed there and decisioned Barry 6-2.

Mike McGlaughlin found Joe Savino weak on the bottom and rode him consistently well for two periods, almost. Almost because in the last thirty seconds of the match Savino reversed Mike and won 4-3. Mike wrestled very well against a talented opponent as Savino was two time runner up in the New York State High School Tournament and last year finished fourth in New England.

At 142 pounds the Rams put their best wrestler against Clay Jester. Charlie Catania finished second to Steve Gaydosh of Springfield in the 1971 New Englands and had come up the chart with a 3-2 decision over Clay. It was the second meeting for both wrestlers and Clay again wound up on the short end. A scoreless first period was followed by a quick escape on Catania's part. Clay spent the rest of the period on his feet but behind 1-0. In the third period Clay escaped quickly and was sparring for takedowns when he received a severe bruise on the neck and then went back out and was taken down. He escaped again and put the rush on his man and as the clock ran out proved that the match might have gone another way if there was more time. With the decision at 142, URI led 6-3.

Catania had mentioned moving up to 150 for the New Englands but after seeing UMass Captain Shelly Goldberg pin Greg Gamon in 3:33 he changed his mind. If ever a pin was needed to give the team some hope it was then and Shelley came through after taking his man down quickly then escaping and taking him down again in the second period. No contest was the best way to describe the bout and gratifying the best way to describe the result as it gave UMass the spirit to bounce back in the end.

Chris Cadwallader lost a tough one to Calderone 4-0 at 158, but this gave Mike Duffy the incentive to poll out a 3-2 victory over Barry at 167. Mike could only get his dump on his opponent once but should have had it in the first period. He then rode for the time necessary to gain the point advantage and the win.

URI had the huskiest 177 pounder seen this year but this didn't do them any good as Bruce Buckbee drew with Horowitz. It was this same freshman that beat the defending champion from Dartmouth in the URI-Dartmouth dual meet. Bruce was tough on top but couldn't turn his opponent over for the necessary points for a win. In the last of the match, however, Bruce had Horowitz worn to the best position for a takedown but couldn't get it.

At 190 freshman John Connelly lost to Vince Stramandinoli 7-3. Stramandinoli is also an experienced wrestler and had some strength over John. All this did not seem so bad however as John's inability to get a takedown. "I think I had three takedowns in high school and I am really going to work on them now," said the Nabnasset grappler.

A man that the Redmen can call on to pull it out in the end-Carl Dambman. Twice this year the wrestlers have brought the match down to the heavyweight bout and placed the burden of a win or loss on Carl's broad shoulders and twice Carl has put the burden on the other man. Carl was again outweighed a good eighty pounds by his opponent, but this time the kid had a bad temper and almost started a fight. With cool aplomb Carl handled the situation with "Hey, take it easy man, I just want to wrestle!" And wrestle he did but not for long as he put his man away with a fall in the early third period and thereby won the bout and the match for UMass 20-17.

The remaining two matches were an anti-climax as the Redmen waltzed over UMaine Orono 31-3 and for the second time this season defeated UConn, 39-2. Russ Chateaneuf scored a fall against his Maine opponent and decisioned his UConn man. Peter Rock had a big victory over Maine and showed that the Redmen can count on him anytime.

Hoopsters Look To End Skid

By DAN KAMAL

The National Basketball Association plays an eighty game schedule, so a bad streak once or twice during the season isn't a matter of grave concern to a team, unless the streak reaches the ridiculous proportions of a typical Cleveland Cavaliers' tailspin.

It ain't that way in college basketball, and one bad streak of even moderate proportions is enough to leave a season in ruin.

Jack Leaman's Redmen are in the midst of a bad streak and while the season is not in ruins, the Redmen stand just three games above .500 with an 11-8 mark and are coming off a lackluster 58-56 loss to UConn, their first conference loss after twenty straight wins. So the question is simply: Where do you go from here?

The answer is just as simple: You look for your next opponent, in this case Boston University.

Terrier teams have had pretty good luck against UMass squads in this, their first year in the Yankee Conference. The football team took the Redmen by 47-21, and the hockey team outskated UMass by 6-4. So, if you're a believer in the law of averages, then something's bound to break.

BU has no intention of trying to end the UMass slump, and there are some good ballplayers on the squad who are capable of making life miserable for the Redmen. Up front for BU are Jim Gauvin, Bob Boyd and Steve Barber.

Gauvin, the biggest of the three at 6'8", is going to be the man to beat if the Redmen wish to win the battle of the boards.

Boyd stands at 6'5" and is a good shooter. Thus far this season he's averaging about 25 points a game. The Redmen will have to contain Boyd.

Steve Barber is the "midget" of the three, standing at 6'3". Barber is the runner, the man who hustles off the boards and gets things going.

The backcourt consists of two mystery men, known only as Sheehan and Dabney. This twosome sounds like dental consultants, but could rate as the key to the BU offense. Sheehan, at 6'1", is another good shooter, at the 6' even Dabney ranks as the floor general for the Terriers.

A slump is something that basketball fans on campus have not seen for a couple of years, but no team is immune. The mark of a good team is when it can break a slump before it gets too long, and then play like it never happened. The next couple of games should write an interesting story.

Basketbrawls Worry Some

NEW YORK (AP) — Blood on college basketball courts this season is giving chills to coaches.

Minnesota's Bill Musselman is "afraid to sneeze."

Musselman, afraid of recurrence of the brutal fight that sent two Buckeye players to the hospital, has gone so far as to discard the gold blazer he wore that night.

"All coaches, and I think most fans, are concerned with the things that have happened in basketball across the country and we want to stop those who are hurting basketball."

"There is no place for fights in college basketball, or any other sport. The positive aspects of competition far outweigh the negative, but trouble like that can only serve to jeopardize the whole program."

The Ohio State-Minnesota brawl was the wildest during a basketball game this season.

"It might just be a sign of the times but the spectator feels he pays his money and has this tremendous freedom," says Southern Cal coach Bob Boyd. "I've never seen coaches and players get so much personal abuse from the crowd as they have this year.

"They use every kind of word you would never be able to print. Fights used to be two-man affairs. You didn't find fans pouring onto the court. You didn't find them going after players. We're getting a little careless with crowd control. You go to an arena where there were 10,000 people and no ushers. What do you do?"

Wooden says the brawls are a spillover from the tense, modern world.

"The students are quick to rebel at anything now," said the coach of the nation's top-ranked team. "Little things they used to take in stride now cause them to react, sometimes violently. It's just a rebellious age-that's the thing that stands out more than anything else."

Olympics - What Next

SAPPORO, Japan (AP)-The Winter Olympic Games, which grew from a modest start in 1924 to Sapporo's stupendous production in 1972, face threats to their existence in the future.

If they meet that challenge, the Winter Games probably never again will have a host nation willing to spend the $70 million needed in Japan.

Denver, Colo., has won the games for 1976 and planners from there talk of an "Economical Olympics" with competition sites at three widely separated locations--Denver, Steamboat Springs and Vail.

They envision an airlift to make travel between those sites possible. And they don't want to build a four-man bobsled run.

Avery Brundage, the 84-year-old president of the International Olympic Committee, who retires this year, urges that the Winter Olympics be dropped.

His argument is that they have become too costly and only relatively few nations compete in the skiing, skating and sled competitions. There were 35 countries represented at Sapporo.

When Austria's Karl Schranz was banned from the 1972 Games on charges of professionalism, the action pointed up another major problem facing the Olympics.

International federations in the various sports feel they should have jurisdiction over eligibility in their specialties. While Brundage argues that professionalism is rampant in Alpine and Nordic skiing, the federations claim they police amateurism according to their rules.

Schranz was certified by the International Ski Federation FIS but disqualified after he had arrived in Sapporo. The Austrian ski officials declared "there was absolutely no solid evidence" against him.

Austria had threatened to withdraw its entire team but when Schranz asked the others to compete, the threat died.

Need For UMass Hospital Questioned

By CHARLES BERKOW

The proposed UMass medical school hospital in Worcester might not be built, according to Massachusetts Secretary of Health Services Peter C. Goldmark Jr. Governor Francis Sargent has agreed to review the "need" of the new hospital in Worcester.

The Worcester Telegram yesterday quoted Governor Sargent as saying that he will study "conflicting reports" on the need for the new hospital in Worcester. He said that he will make the final decision on the hospital within a month.

The Governor's office had earlier reported that it would not review the UMass hospital project.

But Dr. Lamar Soutter, Dean of the UMass medical school in Worcester, believes that Sargent is making a reasonable move now. "If I were in his position, I'd do the same thing," he said. I think he wants to make an intelligent decision based on the facts. I'm certain he doesn't want it to be a political decision."

Sargent was asked to review his decision on the UMass proposal on Monday by Henry Jones, the president of the Massachusetts Blue Cross.

An article published in the Boston Globe yesterday said that Worcester already has "a costly excess of nearly 600 hospital beds." In addition to this, three hospitals in the Worcester area are planning to expand their out-patient facilities and increase their in-patient facilities by 100 new beds and 285 re-built beds.

The state was expected to approve the $25 million worth of expansions today in hearings before the state Public Health Council. However, the Health Department today withdrew its recommendations for approval for the hospital additions. As a result, the Council made no decision either way.

Jones said in a letter recently that the Worcester area already has a surplus of hospital beds. He said that the public in the area could lose as much as $12 million a year through inefficient use of hospital space if the UMass medical school hospital is built without a reduction of some sort in the facilities of the presently existing hospitals in the areas.

When asked to comment on Jones' remarks, Dean Soutter said, "that letter was written on December second, and it was based on statistics collected by the Department of Public Health, which have since been proven to be invalid.

"In fact, the Commissioner of Public Health has rejected them. The statistics collected by the Worcester hospitals and the regional planning people are much more valid, and they show that even with the addition of our (400) beds that Worcester will be underbedded by a considerable number of beds by 1980."

Dean Soutter suggested another reason for Jones' opposition to the school hospital: "I think that he's been under a good deal of pressure from some of the Boston hospitals to do so (oppose the new medical hospitals). When he appeared at a hearing in Worcester he brought as principle speaker the Associate Dean for Hospital Affairs from Harvard, Dr. Sidney Lee.

"And Dr. Sidney Lee was very busily trying to persuade us last fall not to build our hospital. And I think that you can easily see that if we build our hospital we will have an absolutely first class medical school which will be a strong rival to the three in Boston. And if we don't build it, we will have an absolutely third rate medical school."

The Globe reported Dr. Lee as saying that the UMass hospital will take patients away from already under-used and inefficient Worcester hospitals.

Dean Soutter has been reported as saying that the UMass hospital will draw half of its patients from outside the Worcester area. But the UMass medical school is reportedly planning an out-patient facility which can serve, according to the Boston Globe, only the Worcester area.

Dean Soutter told a group of health officials and politicians from the area last week "There is no doubt that there is a growing concerted effort to get rid of the medical school hospital."

Ricci: A Belchertown Friend

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

An old sage once said that if you've met one radical professor then you've met them all. There is always an exception and UMass Professor Ben Ricci is definitely the exception. It's true he doesn't have long hair, but the most outstanding difference in Ben Ricci's character is that he not only gets things done but gets things done fast.

Ricci has been president of the Belchertown Friends Association for the last four years and is the man who organized the class suit against the state Department of Mental Health (DMH). The suit charges that the DMH has been negligent in the care of patients at the Belchertown State School for the retarded.

His performance outside of the University is matched by his performance as a member of the UMass faculty. Ricci has taught at the University since 1950 and is director of laboratory applied physiology. He is also chairman of exercise sciences at UMass.

He got involved in working for the mentally retarded, he told the MDC during an interview last Sunday, only a few yours after his 24-year-old son, Bobby, was born. Bobby is presently a resident at the Belchertown State School and is one of the 28 plaintiffs named in the class suit against the state.

He applied for his son's admission to Belchertown when Bobby was six years old, he said. As he sees it, the action was the "hardest decision" he and his wife have had to make in their lives. He told the MDC: "There were no alternatives, Belchertown or nothing."

It was only two years ago that the Springfield Union printed the "Tragedy of Belchertown"--a series of articles which exposed the inhumane conditions which existed at Belchertown. At the time, Ricci defended the Belchertown administration against the criticisms of the series. Today, Ricci states, "I now realize this was a mistake."

Commenting on Dr. Milton Greenblatt's role as commissioner of the Department of Mental Health, Ricci said: "I wouldn't want him to have anything to do with mental retardation."

About attempts to form a separate Department of Mental Retardation, Ricci said, "I think it is pretty clear that mental retardation is a step-child of the DMH. In fact, we're asking the judge to state that mental retardation is not part of mental illness," he said.

Ben Ricci is a "radical" at the University of Massachusetts--he gets things done. He has served as president of the Belchertown Friends Association for the past four years. He's been a force in the effort to improve the Belchertown State School. (MDC photo by Steve Schuster)

Governor Sargent in his State of the State message proposed a new department in the area of mental health and retardation. The governor's new department would be called the Department of Mental Health and Retardation.

Ricci said this proposal was unacceptable. "I look upon this proposal as a change in wording. There should be and must be a complete separation," he said.

Asked if he took special pleasure in beating the system, Ricci replied, "There is a good feeling in knowing that the bureaucracy can be beat by a concerned group of parents."

Ricci explained why the judicial branch of government was used to fight the Belchertown case. "The executive branch of government has performed in a perfunctory manner," said Ricci. "The governor has insulated himself in this case."

As far as the legislative branch goes, he said, it has enacted some meaningful legislation but has not acted upon these particular bills.

An interesting aspect of the class suit filed against the state DMH is the limited amount of coverage which has appeared in the Boston papers. Ricci reasoned, "perhaps it is because they don't fully understand the national implications which will come from this case. It has a distinctly Western Mass. and Belchertown fixation."

On student involvement at Belchertown, Ricci stated, "UMass students and faculty have had a long history of involvement at Belchertown."

Spring Concert Needs Support

By HUGH OWEN

"The Student Senate should not be the sole supporter of a concert for the students," stated Gary Gomes, a member of the Student Senate and the Concert Committee. "The only way a concert is going to be held this spring is if students get together in support of it. We therefore urge every student at UMass to show their support for the spring concert."

As it stands now the possibility of a spring concert is very feasible, but only if students contribute their support. Money is needed to cover the expenses of the concert and the student body is the prime source for this money. Approximately five thousand dollars is currently available for us in funding the concert, but at least twice that much is still needed.

Elliot Sherman, also a Student Senator and member of the Concert Committee, is asking area governments to contribute money. He has so far received favorable response from the Southwest area government. Sherman stated that any students who wish their government to support the concert need only to contact their area government and request that they help fund the concert.

Commuters who wish to see a concert in the spring are asked to sign a petition at the Commuter table on the Concourse Level of the Campus Center during this week. The Commuter Assembly had previously turned down a request to contribute money to the concert funds. If at least three thousand signatures are collected, however, then the Commuter Assembly will more than likely move to reconsider funding the concert.

Once it becomes clear whether or not students are in support of a spring concert, it will then be left up to the students to decide who will play and where the concert will be held. There are a choice of three areas where the concert can be held--in the stadium, at the Campus pond, or in the Bowditch Lodge area between the stadium and V lot. Gary Gomes expressed his opinion that if the majority of the student body were in favor of holding the concert in the stadium, then surely the administration would not turn down such a request.

Concert Committee meetings are held every Thursday night at nine in Room 175 of the Campus Center. These are open meetings and anyone who wishes to help out or find out more about the concert are invited to stop by.

Faculty Senate Specially Convenes

"There will be a special meeting of the Faculty Senate of the University of Massachusetts/Amherst Thursday, Feb. 17, in order to discuss collective bargaining as a means of enhancing the faculty's role in the governance of the University. Representatives from the various professional associations will present their views on collective bargaining and the contributions their respective associations can make in organizing and representing the faculty before the President and the Board of Trustees. Professor Israel Kugler will speak for the American Federation of Teachers; he is currently President of the New York State Federation of University and College Teachers. Professor Martin Lapidas will represent the American Association of University Professors; he is with the New York office of AAUP. Professor Belle Zeller will present the position of the National Education Association; she is a member of the board of the National Society of Professors NEA.

The meeting will be in the Engineering East Auditorium, Room 131, at 4:00 p.m. The meeting will reconvene in Rooms 169, 174, and 176 of the Campus Center at 7:30 p.m."

Ross Urges Continued WMPIRG Support

Don Ross, assistant to Ralph Nader and a PIRG coordinator, warned a gathering of students last night of the need to sustain the drive for signatures. There is still something that many of you can do. (MDC photo by Barbara Brecher)

By STEVE TRIPOLI

A small gathering of petitioners for the Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (WMPIRG) last night heard Don Ross, one of Ralph Nader's assistatnts and a PIRG coordinator, warn them of the possible difficulties the group faces and exhort them to keep the petitioning going as strong as they did in the beginning.

The major problem facing the petitioners at the moment is that after the initial spurt of petitioning (which netted 3,200 signatures of the needed 8,000 in the first week) the fervor has died down and, in Mr. Ross' words, this represents a "danger signal" in the movement, since 8,000 signatures, or 50% of the student body, are needed to authorize the levying of a $2.00 fee for support of WMPIRG on the student body.

There has been some opposition to this petitioning on the grounds that leveling such a fee as support of WMPIRG on the student body is unconstitutional. Mr. Ross was quick to point out that this is not the case, since students who do not wish to pay the fee can obtain a refund shortly after it is paid. Ross also pointed out legal precedent where the Attorneys General of several states have refused to declare the fee unconstitutional. This topic was of concern to the gathering because of recent "unconstitutional" allegations published in the Letters to the Editor section of the Collegian.

The number of petitions still outstanding was another source of concern of the group. Of approximately 500 petitions in circulation on the UMass campus last week, only 100 were accounted for at last night's meeting.

There is also the factor of the number of petitioners still active in the signature campaign. Last night's meeting showed only a smattering of the support by workers that the campaign received at its inception last week. Many of those who originally attended still have petitions outstanding, and Mr. Ross was quick to point out that although they probably had other commitments to attend to they should at least turn in the petitions that they originally received instead of allowing all those signatures "to be filed in a notebook at home."

One of the final orders of business before throwing the meeting open to discussion was to inform the petitioners of the situation at other, smaller schools in the area. Ross pointed out that other schools in the program in this area are anxious to know about the situation at UMass since it is run on a much larger scale here than in schools of a smaller size. He also pointed out that since the program is going well here we may be called on to aid other schools. "You're going to have to do for them what I'm doing for you tonight if the situation arises."

Graduate Senate Focuses On Ecology

By JEANNETTE MARTINEAU

Monday night's Graduate Student Senate Meeting focused on the question of changing the name of the Department of Environmental Science to the Department of Agriculture and Environmental Microbiology.

According to Senate President Veda Ross, "The graduate students within the department are concerned about the renaming of the Department of Environmental Science, and claim that such a change will hurt the status of the department nationally because it will become a more diversified department, offering a duplication of services already available."

These students and most of the department's faculty have already endorsed a statement to be submitted to Robert Gluckstern, Vice-Chancellor of Academic Affairs, which states that they "strongly oppose the renaming of the Department of Environmental Science to 'Department of Agriculture and Environmental Microbiology'."

Among other reasons, the statement alleges that: "The Department of Microbiology is currently the recipient of a National Institute of General Medical Science-National Institutes of Health Training Grant (one of only three newly granted nationally in basic science in 1971) which provides basic support to several graduate students, and departmental support to further the quality of the program offered by the Department of Microbiology. We have received indications by qualified persons that the unwarranted duplication of effort created by the Department of Agriculture and Environmental Microbiology will be taken as evidence of lack of administrative commitment toward the Department of Microbiology and thus unfavorably affect the evaluation by a review committee of the climate for modern graduate education in microbiology at the University."

The Grad Senate "resolved that...such a namechange be referred to the Student Affairs Committee for further investigation" and "express(ed) grave concern over the distress put upon the Graduate Students and Faculty of both the Microbiology and Biochemistry Departments."

In other business, the Senate also voted to issue a statement "in support of Freda Salzman's claim to tenure and reinstatement."

Also discussed and tabled were motions concerning a Graduate Review Board. This motion stated that "The University has no due process...to safeguard grad students."

Further funding of the University's Day-Care Center also came under consideration, and was tabled pending the submission of an updated budget.

An "ad hoc" study committee to the Future University Committee was also discussed, and a Grad Student Senate Constitution Committee and a Publicity Committee were created.

The next meeting is scheduled for Monday, February 28, at 7:30.

Student Fee Hike Discussed

By JOYCE KOSOFSKY and MIKE GREGORY

Last night's meeting of the Rent and Fees Committee focused mainly on possible increases in student fees. The increases are at this point in the proposal stage. Attending the meeting were Terry Grinan, Head of the Campus Center, Charles Hampton of the Housing Office, Thomas Campion, Vice-Chancellor for Administrative Services, Joel Stoneham, Director of Food Services, and members of the University and State Communications Council, (U.S.C.C.)

The U.S.C.C. commented that it is still too early for them to foresee any increase of student tuitions. There are presently twelve bills filed in the State House, eleven of which are for an increase ranging from 35%-60% of instructional costs, and one bill which would provide for free tuition. The U.S.C.C. stated that Governor Sargent will probably introduce his own kind of bill for increases in tuition.

The feeling in the Legislature against tuition increase is not as strong as in the past. This is due to the tight economic crisis in the State. Although the U.S.C.C. had no specific ideas for the Rent and Fees Committee at this time, it was suggested that the two groups meet every other week.

Terry Grinan mentioned that he had only 50% of the data for the 1973 fiscal year budget for the Campus Center. He is still waiting for Whitmore to send him the information on the cost of living increment for employees.

Chuck Hampton of Housing said, of the 12,166 possible bed spaces, only 11,877 beds were being used because counselors are having single rooms, rooms being knocked out for the use of snack bars, etc. Committee member Marty Wilson suggested that the people occupying singles should be charged extra in order to compensate for the 289 spaces not being used. Mr. Hampton then mentioned that this would affect some 2,000 students living in these single rooms.

Before he can predict any increases, Joel Stoneham, Director of Food Services, said that he would need projected housing occupancy along with the class mix(the number of seniors, juniors, sophomores, and freshmen living in the dorms). Once he has these figures, then it will be a short time before he will make any predictions.

The problem of student fee increases cannot be fully resolved until the budgets from the Administration are presented in their entirety before the Rent and Fees Committee. The exact amount of any increase will be decided sometime this spring.

Military Coup In Ecuador

QUITO, Ecuador (AP)- President Juan Maria Velasco Ibarra was overthrown in a military coup Tuesday night, unofficial sources reported.

They said the coup was led by Gen. Guillermo Rodriguez Lara, the army commander, with the aid of other military leaders.

It would be the fourth time Velasco Ibarra, 79, has been overthrown. He has been elected president five times.

Velasco Ibarra was elected last in 1968 and assumed dictatorial powers in 1970.

An ousted general led a military uprising against him a year ago, demanding he fire Jorge Acosta Velasco as defense minister. Acosta Velasco, the president's nephew, was dismissed a week later in response to the pressure.

During Velasco Ibarra's administration, Ecuador and the United States have been involved in a "tuna war" in which Ecuador has seized dozens of U.S. tuna fishing boats for operating within its controversial 200-mile sea limit. The United States recognizes only a three-mile sea limit and 12 miles for fishing control.

Mitchell Resigns Post; Kleindienst Appointed

WASHINGTON (AP)-John N. Mitchell resigned as attorney general Tuesday to take command of President Nixon's re-election campaign. Nixon quickly tapped Richard G. Kleindienst, Mitchell's deputy and personal choice for the Cabinet post.

Senate liberals promised close questioning of Kleindienst, an Arizona conservative, but early indications were that his nomination as the President's top legal adviser would gain Senate confirmation.

Mitchell, one of Nixon's closest personal and political advisers, managed his 1968 campaign. His resignation to direct the 1972 effort had been expected for months, but apparently was delayed by debate within the administration about his successor.

The pipe-smoking, taciturn Mitchell was reported to have insisted that Kleindienst get the job, while other administration officials feared that his nomination would touch off a Senate donnybrook.

But the Senate liberals who planned close questioning of Kleindienst at his confirmation hearings, scheduled to begin Feb. 22, said Senate approval is likely.

Mitchell is the sixth member of Nixon's original Cabinet to resign. Secretary of Commerce Maurice Stans recently quit to become the chief fund raiser for the Committee for the Re-election of the President-the same organization Mitchell will head beginning March 1.

Sen. James O. Eastland, D-Miss., a conservative who heads the Judiciary Committee which will examine the nomination, said Kleindienst has been a great deputy attorney general and will be a worthy successor to Mitchell.

Perhaps more significantly, Sen. Phillip A. Hart, D-Mich., one of the more liberal members of the committee, said "If the President says he needs him, the Senate should go along with it unless the nominee has a moral defect. And I know of no moral defects in Richard Kleindienst."

Mitchell gave Nixon a handwritten letter of resignation Monday and the President responded Tuesday with a four-paragraph letter saying he accepted his departure from the Cabinet "on a note of the utmost regret-but a regret compensated by a sense of personal and heartfelt gratitude on behalf of myself and all Americans."

Awaiting Mitchell at the re-election campaign headquarters a block from the White House is a staff of about 100 paid political workers and an organization which already extends to about half the states.

Kleindienst, who managed Sen. Barry Goldwater's 1964 bid for the White House and was active in Nixon's 1968 campaign, joined the Justice Department as deputy attorney general at Mitchell's behest immediately after Nixon's inauguration.

The 48-year-old Harvard Law School graduate Arizona State legislator and one-time candidate for governor of Arizona has been identified as a conservative on such issues as civil rights, civil liberaties and wiretapping.

Senate Reaffirms Civil Rights Act

WASHINGTON (AP)-The Senate reversed itself Tuesday and voted for enforcement through the courts of the 1964 Civil Rights Act's ban on racial and other discimination in employment.

By a 45-39 vote, it adopted an amendment by Sen. Peter H. Dominick, R-Colo., erasing from a hotly-contested bill authority for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to issue cease-and-desist orders.

Under the amendment, the EEOC would have to bring enforcement suits in the federal courts rather than have the power to order employers or labor unions to half alleged discrimination.

The amendment, previously rejected by the Senate in slightly different form, seemed likely to break the impasse over the bill and clear the way for its early passage.

Dominick told the Senate that if his amendment were not adopted, he saw no chance of getting any bill

But he indicated that if his amendment were accepted, he would join if necessary in a move to invoke the Senate's anti-filibuster rule and bring the debate to a halt.

Two debate cutoff moves have fallen short of the required two-thirds majority.

Dominick's latest amendment differed from his original primarily by providing for expedited handling of job-discrimination cases in the federal courts.

It provides that if the EEOC's general counsel certifies that a case is of general public importance, it shall be heard by a three-judge federal court with direct appeal to the Supreme Court.

Dominick's amendment is in line with what President Nixon has recommended. It also is the type of enforcement the House voted in passing its own bill last year.

Civil rights forces, however, have long urged that the EEOC be given cease-and-desist powers to enforce the ban on job discrimination based on race, religion, sex, or national origin.

At present the commission is limited to trying to effect voluntary compliance through persuasion and conciliation.

In Brief...

McCloskey Challenges Nixon To Debate

(AP)-Rep. Paul N. McCloskey, R-Calif., who is seeking to unseat President Nixon, challenged the President Tuesday to a face-to-face debate.

McCloskey, speaking in Denver, N.H. on a campaign swing for the state's March 7 presidential primary, said the debate with Nixon "would allow the voters of New Hampshire to see the President in their state prior to the primary." He also said it would allow the voters "the opportunity to judge between Mr. Nixon and myself as to whom they would support on election day."

Earlier, McCloskey said that when the Nixon administration "starts calling its critics traitors, something is wrong in this country."

Lawyer Number Two In Justice Department

WASHINGTON (AP)-A Stonington, Conn. lawyer was named Tuesday to the number two spot in the Justice Department following the resignation of Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell.

President Nixon announced he would name Louis Patrick Gray III, 55, to be deputy attorney general succeeding Richard Kleindienst who will move up into the attorney general's when Mitchell resigns March 1.

Shirley Chisholm Opens Campaign

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP)-Rep. Shirley Chisholm, D-N.Y., opened her Massachusetts campaign for the presidency Tuesday and told a group of predominantly black supporters, "It's time for the have-nots of this country to get together."

Mrs. Chisholm, speaking to about 400 persons in the gymnasium of the Cambridge Community Center, apologized to the group for the lack of fanfare accompanying her arrival.

"I'm poor, I'm black and I'm a woman," she said. "The only thing I have is a gut commitment to you, the people."

Heath Urges Coal Strike Settlement

LONDON (AP)-Prime Minister Edward Heath urged Britain's trade union movement Tuesday to end the coal miners' strike that could halt British industry within two weeks. The powerful Trade Union Congress turned him down.

The number of workers laid off because of electric power cuts passed one million. Thousands of trade unionists and miners marched on Parliament, chanting "Heath out" and demanding that the government grant the miners' pay demands.

Heath held urgent discussions with TUC General Secretary Victor Feather in an attempt to end the walkout, now in its sixth week. Later, however, the TUC rejected Heath's appeal for the miners to go back to work, and accused the government of mishandling the strike.

The House of Lords followed the Commons' lead in approving government emergency measures to deal with Britain's worst industrial crisis since the general strike in 1926.

The Central Electricity Generating Board announced that more large voltage reductions to homes and factories would begin Wednesday, to conserve dwindling coal supplies at power stations blockaded by picketing miners. British industry already is on a three-day week.

An estimated 9,000 demonstrators scuffled with police outside the Houseof Commons. The demonstrators eventually were pushed back. About 200 petitioners Police made no arrests.

The three-mile parade through London followed Heath's meeting with Feather whose TUC represents nine million workers.

Government sources said the prime minister asked Feather and the TUC to urge an early return to the pits and an end to the picketing of power stations.

The sources said Heath also warned that unless new fuel supplies get through to power stations quickly, the nation's entire work force risks layoffs.

It was Heath's first personal intervention in the miners' strike, now in its sixth week. His critics have charged that government intervention sooner could have prevented the electric power crisis.

All sides appeared to be putting their hopes for a settlement on a government-named inquiry board that began hearings on the pay dispute Tuesday. They expect to make recommendations Friday.

Miners working below ground now make $49.40 a week. They want to raise of $15.50. The state-run coal board has offered $7.80.

The government inquiry is widely expected to recommend a settlement that splits the difference.

Gilday Jurors View Scene

BOSTON (AP)-A 16-member jury, including four women, Tuesday viewed the place where Patrolman Walter A Schroeder was slain Sept. 23, 1970, during a $26,000 robbery of the Brighton branch of State Street Bank and Trust Co.

The jury was completed earlier in the day for the trial of William M. Gilday, 42, of Amesbury, charged with murder in the policeman's killing.

Two other men, Stanley Bond, 26, of Cambridge and Robert Valeri, 22, of Somerville, will be tried later on the same charge.

The jury also was taken to see the apartments of Susan E. Saxe, 21, of Albany, N.Y., and Katherine A. Power, 21, of Denver, Colo., indicted with the men on charges of murder and armed robbery. The two women have been fugitives since the crime.

Deficit Continues Plunge

WASHINGTON (AP) — The nation's balance-of-payments deficit slid to its worst level in history in 1971 and still remained a massive figure in the last three months of the year, the government reported Tuesday.

The Commerce Department reported that the deficit, as measured by the broadest yardstick, was $29.6 billion, the largest in history and a $19.8 billion worsening from 1970.

And, in the last three months of the year, the payments deficit was $6.1-billion, an improvement over the previous quarter, but still large in the face of Nixon administration moves to stabilize the dollar.

The Commerce Department blamed the 1971 deficit on the nation's worsening trade position as well as the instability of the dollar prior to Aug. 15, when President Nixon announced the United States would no longer redeem dollars for gold.

The deficit mostly reflected transactions that occurred before Dec. 18, when the 10 richest non-Communist nations reached agreement on a new set of money-exchange rates designed to correct imbalances between currencies.

The administration hopes that the currency settlement will help to improve the balance-of-payments picture in 1972. But it has expressed doubt that the nation can turn in a surplus on its payments account for at least two years.

According to the department, the deficit as measured on the official reserve transactions basis, was $29.6 billion last year. This yardstick takes into account trade, goods and services, and transactions between foreign central banks and foreign governments.

By another measurement, the net liquidity balance, the deficit was also the worst in history, $22.2 billion. In the last three months of the year, the liquidity balance was in the red by $4.5 billion. This balance primarily measures trade and transactions between individuals and companies.

Soviet Farming In Trouble

MOSCOW (AP) — Agriculture, the only major sector of the Soviet economy which fell short of last year's quotas, is in trouble again.

Scant snowfall has left the European and Central Asian regions lacking as much as 95 per cent of the normal protective cover for winter grain crops. The governmentcontrolled press says abnormal weather has caused significant damage.

Winter kill in 1968-69 brought a disaster, with 35 per cent of the crop requiring a resowing. Press reports indicate the present winter kill might require almost two million tons of grain for resowing. This seed otherwise would be available for feeding livestock.

Heavy snow in grain-growing region not only protects the overwintering crop but also provides moisture for spring-sown crops. A bad spring could force the Russians to reduce exports or import grain to make up for losses. In 1970 exports amounted to $374 million but last year substantial quantities of grain were imported from Canada, Australia, France and the United States.

Ironically, sheep breeders in Georgia and Azerbaijan have more snow than they can handle. A 12-inch fall last month has remained on the ground. This means hay must be transported to flocks, and in many areas the sheep must be moved from pastures to shelters. Three years ago 10 million sheep froze to death, and the number of animals has not yet recovered that blow.

B-52's Resume Viet Bombing

SAIGON (AP) — U.S. B52 bombers, including some from Guam, resumed the pounding of South Vietnam Tuesday shortly after the end of a 24-hour allied cease-fire for the Tet lunar new year.

The intensive air campaign, which went into its seventh day, is designed to smash enemy buildups and prevent ground offensives that could endanger withdrawing American troops, the U.S. Command says.

Nevertheless, the aerial strikes also appear designed to ease the task of the South Vietnamese army. It has neither the resources nor the manpower to search out enemy forces in the jungled areas of the nation's borders with Laos and Cambodia.

The U.S. Command refused to confirm or deny that B52 bombers recently ordered to Guam from the United States were flying missions over South Vietnam. It said only that air operations "could include B52s from Guam."

Sources outside the command reported, however, that the reserve squadrons began flying their first missions from the Pacific island Monday.

The U.S. and South Vietnamese commands claimed Communist-led forces violated the allies' 24-hour truce 33 times. These were small attacks and all but two were aimed at South Vietnamese positions.

Eighteen of the violations, the commands asserted, resulted in casualties. Overall, eight South Vietnamese were reported killed and 21 wounded. Enemy losses were not reported.

The two incidents aimed at American troops did not cause any casualties, the command said.

A unilaterally declared Viet Cong cease-fire, which the U.S. and South Vietnamese commands are ignoring, is scheduled to end at 1 a.m. Friday, Saigon time.

The allies refused to participate in the enemy's 96-hour-long truce on the ground that the Communist command would use the period to move in men and supplies for an attack on South Vietnam.

The U.S. Command announced the phaseout of 4,580 troops from Vietnam, the largest cut since November. It involves 50 Army outfits and 2 Air Force squadrons.

The command's latest report lists 131,200 Americans in South Vietnam. President Nixon has ordered the total cut to 69,000 during the next 2-1/2 months.

While American troop strength is being sliced, the number of air strikes being flown by U.S. planes has increased to as many as 250 a day in South Vietnam.

U.S. planes also fly scores of missions in neighboring Laos and Cambodia.

The stepped-up air strikes are being flown mostly by the Strategic Air Command's B52 fleet and by warplanes from the U.S. 7th Fleet.

Pardon Asked

BOSTON (AP) — Petitions asking pardons for 190 persons convicted of violating a Lexington park ordinance during a peace march last Memorial Day were presented Tuesday to the Executive Council.

Julian Soshnick of Lexington, an attorney, said the papers bore the signatures of about 3,000 persons

The pardon petitions for those arrested at Lexington will be forwarded to the state Advisory Board of Pardons.

The 190 persons, including Vietnam Veterans and town residents, were arrested after Lexington selectmen refused to allow the group to spend the night on the town green.

Arrest Warrants Issued For Mrs. Irving

CIGARETTE AFTER DINNER–Clifford Irving, center, lights a cigarette outside a Manhattan restaurant Friday after having a meal with his wife, Edith, and his research assistant, Richard R. Suskind, right. Irving, author of a purported autobiography of billionaire Howard R. Hughes, declined comment on published reports that Irving had admitted never meeting the billionaire reciuse and that he had offered to tell more only if assured his wife would not be prosecuted in the U.S. or Switzerland. (AP)

NEW YORK (AP)-A U.S. magistrate issued a warrant Tuesday on behalf of the Swiss government for the arrest of Mrs. Clifford Irving, whose husband's purported autobiography of Howard Hughes is under investigation.

The Swiss have asked for extradition of Mrs. Irving, 36, a German-born Swiss citizen, on charges of bank fraud and passport forgery.

Irving said she used a passport made out to "Helga R. Hughes" to open an account in a Swiss bank, where she deposited $650,000 intended by McGraw-Hill Inc. for Hughes for rights to his life story.

Irving says he helped compile the "autobiography."

Mrs. Irving later withdrew the money and deposited $442,000 of it in another Swiss bank under yet another name, Swiss authorities said. The rest is not fully accounted for.

Irving, 41, claimed that Hughes had ordered the peculiar bank arrangements.

In a telephone news conference and by court affidavit, Hughes purportedly denied he never saw Irving, or got the $650,000 in checks payable to "H.R. Hughes."

During the investigation by two grand juries, Irving brought his wife and their two children here from their home on the Spanish island of Ibiza.

U.S. Magistrate Martin Jacobs issued the warrant for Mrs. Irving after a 40-minute closed-door session with U.S. and Swiss authorities.

Elsewhere in the building, Danish cabaret singer Nina van Pallandt said she had told a federal grand jury that Irving never saw Hughes in her presence during a trip they took to Mexico last year.

"It has been quite an ordeal," the tall, 39-year-old blonde told reporters after a half-hour voluntary appearance before the jury.

Baronness van Pallandt, who is estranged from her Durch husband, followed another of the women in Irving's life before the federal grand jury.

Anne Baxter, a Florida scuba-diving instructor, declined to tell newsmen what she said in her 35-minute appearance. Presumably it concerned a trip she and Irving allegedly made to St. Croix in the Virgin Islands in December.

Before the warrant for her arrest was issued, Mrs. Irving told reporters she did not think she would be extradited.

Her plans, she said, were to return to their home on Ibiza when the investigation is over.

Soviet Translator To Face Spy Charges

NEW YORK (AP)-A Russian translator at the United Nations was arraigned Tuesday on charges of trying to buy secret plans of the Navy's new F14A fighter plane.

Valery Ivanovich Markelov, 32, a translator of scientific and technical documents for almost five years, was held in $500,000 bail pending a hearing for bond reduction Wednesday.

Markelov, chunky and of medium height, was arrested by the FBI Monday outside a Patchogue, Long Island, restaurant where he allegedly had received classified documents from an unidentified Grumman Aerospace engineer who was serving as an undercover agent for the FBI.

Grumman is building prototypes of the plane.

U.N. Secretary-General Kurt suspended Markelov without pay pending the outcome of the case.

The Soviet citizen, appearing before U.S. Magistrate Max Schiffman in Brooklyn, refused to be fingerprinted or to answer questions until advised by Soviet Consul Leonid V. Shcherbakov to cooperate.

Markelov's wife and 11-year-old daughter were at home in the family's $300-a-month hotel apartment on Manhattan's Upper West Side, where neighbors described the three as quiet people who minded their own business. The manager said about 25 Russian families lived in the hotel.

Markelov, whose five-year contract with the United Nations was to expire Nov. 13, was said to earn between $10,000 and $24,000 a year.

FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover said in Washington Markelov had 11 meetings starting in 1970 with the engineer, whom the agency declined to identify, at restaurants in this area.

The FBI announcement said Markelov "persistently requested confidential information" about the F14A and supplied the engineer with a portable copying machine and a 35mm camera to copy documents.

The FBI said that on many occasions, the Russian gave the engineer money which the American then turned over to the FBI.

Snowmobile Noise Attacked

CHICAGO, Ill. (AP)-The noise from some snowmobiles is potentially more damaging to hearing than that from most rock 'n' roll groups, two Michigan researchers say.

The noise levels of the heavy model of the winter sports vehicles "appear more intense than other forms of recreational and environmental noise," they report.

Dr. Fred H. Bess and Robert E. Poynor of the Hearing Clinic of Central Michigan University, Mount Pleasant, report on their study of snowmobile noise in the February issue of the Archives of Otolaryngology, published by the American Medical Association.

Many snowmobile drivers report a ringing in their ears and temporary hearing loss "after rides of even short duration," they say.

"Racing drivers have reported temporary losses varying from four to 14 days following competition racing," they add, and cite a case of marked permanent hearing loss in one youth who had drive a highpower, "souped up" snowmobile for five years.

The Central Michigan study involved 12 drivers, ages 11 to 33, and five passengers, ages 6 to 30, with a median age of 14.

The subjects rode the vehicles for two hours in a cross-country "safari" and were tested before and after the ride.

Even at idle the noise level from 22-horsepower snowmobiles exceeded the levels considered to be potentially damaging, the researchers report.

Measured half an hour after the "safari", the subject still showed some hearing loss, they found.

They observed that most of the subjects tested in the study rode the snowmobile an average of two hours a day during the school week and three to five hours each on Saturday and Sunday.

Many snowmobilers ride for as long as eight hours on weekend trips, they noted.

Short Hair Now The New 'Thing'

Larry Taylor saw his ears the other day for the first time in two years.

Taylor is a New York public relations man, supersentsitive to what's "in." And what's becoming "in" these days is shorter hair for men.

After almost a decade of cascading male manes, a reversal is beginning to set in. Masculine hair lengths are receding a bit—though hardly back to the crewcut style of old.

The new look, which first took hold in England and France early last year before crossing to the United States, "is neater and slightly shorter but not the real short cut of the '50s," according to Chicago barber Paul Guarino.

In fact, Jerry Spallina, who charges $50 for a "pinch cut" at his salon in New York's Bergdorf Goodman department store, compares the shorter style to the compromise between the extremes of the Maxi and midi in women's hemlines. "It's a blunt cut done in layers," he explains. "You just shake your head and it all falls into place.

Taylor says he decided to opt for this kind of shorter cut because "I got sick of having to fuss with my hair and spend 20 minutes under a hand dryer whenever I washed it."

Indeed, convenience as well as appearance seems to be spurring the new trend. "The surfers and the Beatles promoted the long-haired look and everybody wanted to get with it," says New York hair stylist Hugh Harrison. "Then it got long and greasy and messy and nobody looked individual anymore. So the trend now is to have shaped, groomed hair.

"Hair fashion seems ripe for this brand of conservatism right now. Long hair expressed something in our society. People were doing their own things. Now they're trying to express something else that's more individual.

But there are more practical considerations at work, too. As some of the youngsters who helped popularize long hair have moved out into the workaday world, they have had to choose between their locks and their paychecks.

One afternoon recently, for example, two shaggy haired field representatives for an insurance company walked into Florencia's men's salon in Hollywood and handed the barber a slip of paper which listed the company's specifications for haircuts (hair no longer than the shirt collar, sideburns no longer than the earlobe, etc.).

"It's not that I want it this way," one of the young men said, "but I've got no choice if I want to keep my job. That's the way the company wants it."

Montague Dump Fate Held By Waste Council

The fate of the controversial state landfill proposed for the Montague Plains appears to be in the hands of the fledging Solid Waste Disposal Council.

The Department of Public Works appeared at a Boston meeting of the Water Resources Commission yesterday to discuss the proposed dump, by matters were left "up in the air" according th Water Resources Division Director Charles F. Kennedy.

Associate DPW Commissioner John P. King personally appeared at the meeting to give the briefing requested by the Water Resources Commission last month.

King told the Union that all rubbish disposal policy will be set by the council-including the selection of sites.

"I'm quite confident there will be a direct consideration of the Montague situation by the council," King said. "Their answer could be yes, no, or maybe."

Council chairman Charles H.W. Foster, the secretary of environmental affairs, could not be reached for comment. A spokesman, however, said a draft of its first report is being prepared and a meeting will be held sometime this week.

GOV. Sargent created the council, which includes Foster, Secretary of Transportation Allen Altschuler and Secretary of Human Services Peter C. Goldmark after considerable political pressure was generated in opposition to the Montague site.

Kennedy said the Water Resources Commission "took no action and drew no conclusions" from King's report, and indicated no action will be taken until the DPW presents a formal proposal for approval of the Montague site.

King said a proposal will be prepared after guidance is received form the Council.

"To my knowledge, the Montague proposal has not been scratched," he said. "There are many questions to be answered. I still feel there may be potential at the Montague site, but it depends on what the council has to say."

King said the DPW is concerned about the water pollution dangers which the town has based its opposition on, "despite what many people have said to the contrary."

Montgomery Blues Coming Soon

The James Montgomery Blues Band comes to the UMass Campus Center Auditorium Thursday evening at 8:00 p.m. to perform at a benefit concert for Room to Move. Accompanying the Montgomery Band will be the Colwell-Winfield Blues Band, a widely recognized Boston-based blues band.

The James Montgomery Blues Band has appeared at UMass twice this year, playing before overflowing capacity audiences both times. In their last engagement here, the Band kept the capacity crowd dancing until 4:00 the next morning.

Curently touring through New England, the band will headline a show at the Paramount Theatre in Springfield the following evening, and then head back to Boston for appearances at Wellesley College. They will work through Connecticut for the next few weeks and then head to Maine to play with the James Cotton Blues Band on Friday, Feb. 25, and with B.B. King at UConn on Sunday, February 27.

Admission to Thursday night's concert is $1.00, with proceeds going to Room to Move, which will then turn the money back to the UMass community through its many services.

McCartney's Protest Banned

LONDON.—A vocal demand by songwriter Paul McCartney to "give Ireland back to the Irish" is to be kept from radio listeners in Britain.

A recording of the former Beatle's latest song has been banned by the British Broadcasting Corporation as "politically controversial."

Such a ban is unusual. The B.B.C., which has a monopoly in raido, usually shows its displeasure by confining records to which listeners may take offense to off-peak-hours. But nowadays it is extremely sensitive to criticism by Conservatives that it has been giving too much publicity to the Irish Republicans in Ulster.

Mr. McCartney, whose song asks "What are we doing in the land across the sea," says he has not previously bothered with protest songs.

Independent television rejected a commercial for the song on the ground it contained "political controversy."

Support SOS

The Collegian strongly supports Students Offering Support (SOS)-an organization formed to express support and obtain funds for the Belchertown State School class suit. It is a rare occurrence when students are able to right a wrong by working through the system.

The suit filed by 28 parents of residents at the Belchertown School charges that the state has been negligent in the care of patients at the school. It is expected that the legal cost in taking this case to the U.S. District Court will be outstanding, and that the case could possibly be drawn out by the state in order to drain funds of the parents directly involved in the suit.

As of last Friday, a federal judge ordered the State Department of Mental Health to undertake certain steps to alleviate some of the inhumane conditions and unjust policies which exist at the Belchertown School. A spokesman for Peter C. Goldmark, secretary of Human Services said there was "nothing new to report" Monday regarding what steps the state is taking to comply to the Court's historical decision.

Our answer is that the time has come for all UMass students and faculty members to throw their complete support to SOS and to make sure that this case is not lost on a financial basis. SOS has made the first move and now it's up to the University community to insure that justice and humane conditions are brought to Belchertown and other institutions for the retarded.

If the state wins this case, it will only be because the necessary funds were not made available to the parents. It is also true that if the parents lose this case, the inhumane and sterile conditions which now exist at the Belchertown School will never change.

Whatsdacopdoinhere

Once upon a time at the little college in the wally there was this cat smokin' corn silk. Now this guy used to sit around all day in the barn at the center of the 50 student campus suckin' on this weed that he used to raise in his agee 100 class.

"Hey man, what's that weed hangin' outa your face?" his prof would ask.

"What this?" he would point to the joint. "Man that's a Massachusetts Fat...Ya know...like a Virgin's Shin."

Now the students didn't care whether this cat smoked Massachusetts Fats or Virgins Shins, and the little gremlins who lived in the wally around the college didn't care either. But the local constabulary would go wild when this cat lit up his corn silk.

"Looka dat smarty der, smokin' dat ting. Hey you stupid you put out dat butt...I throw you in dee can."

And they'd chase this freak from one end of the campus to the next. But alas he would escape into the crowd of 50 students.

"Where dat hippy go?" the constabulary would say. "Me don't know day all looka like to me," the crowd chorused.

Well to make a long story short, the constabulary took their case to the local "dishereattorney". Now the "dishereattorney" was cool.

"What does this individual look like, officer?" he asked.

"Dis kid he got hair ya see...all over de place, hanging out his nose on the palms of his hands stickin outa his shirt and pant cuffs, all over de place," he would answer.

"Officer," the "dishereattorney" said, "Was he Black or White, short or tall, what?"

"Dis suspeck was kinda brown?", he answered.

"Kind of brown. Any distinguishing marks, scars or what?"

"Ya he had this ting stickin outa his face and it was on fire."

"Sounds like a pusher to me. We better look into this...might have to go under cover," said the "dishereattorney."

"What about the 15 murder and rape cases we have to investigate?" his assistant pork poacher asked.

"This is much more important. If we don't stop them now they may get the vote."

So the "dishereattorney" picked a smart member of the constabulary to pose as a student, gave him 15 pounds of corn silk and an old Volkswagen bus with the words "PIECE" painted on both sides.

The agent in his disguise of hair and blue denims quickly began to mingle with the students.

"Hi young man want to buy some corn silk? cool, cool," he said.

"Must be an English major or foreigner," the students said to themselves.

Now the agent finally found the hippy who lived at the center of the campus.

"Hi young man want to buy some weed? If you wish I can direct you to 618 Commonwealth Ave. and there in my Volkswagon vehicle with the words "PIECE" painted on it I can allow you to purchase this bag of cornuskus silkum for a modest fee," said the agent from the constabulary.

"You for real man? Hey were you from England or something?" answered the Hippy. "Look I've got to get to my botany class. You know core requirements and all."

"Core...Latin name...must be a secret meeting of dope fiends...better see if I can get in," said the agent to himself. "Hey young man do you mind if I accompany you to the Core?" he asked the hippy.

"No man...anybody can get in," he answered.

"Ha Ha it worked, now we can clean up this ring of freaks and pinkos," said the agent to himself.

So they went to this big theater type place where this little old white-haired prof. was dissecting a pumpkin and speaking half in Latin and half in English.

"Must be a foreigner...Mexican maybe," said the agent.

"Now ladies and gentlemen," said the prof, "this is an pumcinus goldum."

"Pumkinus goldum...he is a Mexican." The agent was getting excited with each new display of vegetation till finally...

"And this, students, is Cornus Cobbum. Cornus Cobbum is the staple food of the North American Peccary."

"Cornus Cobbum...Peccary...must be some synthetic junk or something, this is getting better," said the secret agent.

"Bring in the peccary," said the professor, "and we'll demonstrate his ravenous efforts to get to the Cornus Cobbum."

"Ha, Ha, I can get them on obscenity too...hee, hee, this is great," said the agent to himself.

"Onk"

"What's that?" said the agent out loud in a panic.

"Yes, bring it right in here where we can get a good look at it," said the prof to one of his students.

"Onk Onk Onk Onk Onk," protested the peccary.

"I feel dizzy, I'm going to be sick...AAAAHHH," yelled the secret agent as he collapsed to the floor. Peccaries affect secret agents that way.

"What is the matter with him," yelled the prof in distress.

"I don't know," said a student bending over the agent. "His eyes are dilating; he must be withdrawing."

"Quick! get the peccary out of here and bring the young man here," said the prof.

But the moment the beast was removed from the theatre, the agent began to come around.

"Are you all right young man?" asked the prof.

"Yes sir quite," he answered.

"Very well, let's get on with the lecture," said the prof with a wave of his hand.

"And this students is fieldus grass." It was a bonanza to the agent.

"Fieldus Grass." "Grass," he yelled. "You're all under arrest."

Quickly the constabulary closed in. They had netted the big one, 50 students, one prof. and three janitors. It was the biggest bust in College Wally history.

The "dishereattorney" is back on his 15 murder and rape cases and the campus has gone back to the environment. All the students are in the can and College Wally has turned into a vast corn field where 15 happy maniacks chase Virgin Shins far into the night.

"Onk!"

New Lamps For Old

"So, What's Your View On 'Close Proximity' Talks?"

(Herblock is on vacation)

WASHINGTON--The New Nixon was furious. The White House staff had never seen him so mad. "Where is he?" he demanded as he opened closets, looked under beds and searched behind the drapes.

"Who, Mr. President?"

"The Old Nixon," the New Nixon said, storming down the halls.

"I think I saw him in Bob Haldeman's office," someone said.

"I might have known it," the New Nixon muttered. He walked into Haldeman's office, and there he found the Old Nixon hiding under Haldeman's desk.

The Old Nixon looked up sheepishly, "Were you looking for me?"

"No, I was looking for Howard Hughes. What on earth did you do on The Today Show the other morning?"

"I didn't do anything," the Old Nixon said. "I'm clean."

"Clean, my eye. You got Bob Haldeman to say that anyone who didn't go along with my peace plan was a traitor and consciously aiding and abetting the enemy."

"Well, what's wrong with that?" the Old Nixon demanded.

"Nothing except that now the Democratic candidates are accusing me of using Joe McCarthy tactics to win the election. I didn't want to bring up the patriotism issue this early in the campaign."

"Ah, come on Dick," the Old Nixon said. "I was just having fun. Haldeman had never appeared on a television show before, and he came to me for a little guidance. I figured it wouldn't hurt anything if he accused the Democrats of a little treason."

The New Nixon said, "For heaven's sake, Tricky, can't you get it through your head that we've got to stop that kind of mudslinging? There are a lot of people in this country who want to get out of Vietnam, and they don't care how we do it. If you start accusing them of treason, the whole thing will backfire on us."

"Look, you didn't say it. Haldeman said it. He was speaking as a private citizen. Why don't you have Ron Ziegler announce that he was just speaking for himself?"

"I've done that already," the New Nixon said. "But I want you to stay away from my staff. Except for Kissinger, none of them knows one end of a microphone from the other."

"I think you're overreacting, Dick. The staff likes me. I tell them how it was in the old days before you got your 'President-of-all-the-people' complex."

"Why don't you just go away and let me run the country?"

"Because you need me, Dick, and you know it. You're not going to have an easy time of it in November in spite of all your trips around the world kowtowing to those Commie leaders. When you're finished with all your statesmanship, it's still good old dirty politics that are going to win the election."

"Look, Tricky, I have to go to China. How can I leave both you and Agnew behind to make mischief?"

"Well, you know we won't be on The Today Show because Barbara Walters is going with you. If you're so worried, why don't you take me along?"

"Are you out of your mind? I'd have to bump somebody from the Washington Post or the New York Times off the plane. I couldn't do that."

"I could," the Old Nixon grinned evilly.

"Now you listen to me. I'm going on the radio today to say that I do not consider any of my Democratic critics traitors because they disagree with my Vietnam peace policy. I'm going to ask them to think before they speak, but I'm going to clear them of Haldeman's implications. I don't want you to talk to Haldeman or Erlichman or Klein or anyone else on my staff without first clearing it with me."

"But what am I going to do all day?"

"Here's $2.50. Why don't you go and see 'Patton' again?"

Letters To The Editor

The Only Remedy

To the Editor:

After examining all available information pertaining to the Freda Salzman case we submit the following:

In 1965 the Trustees appointed both George and Freda Salzman to the UMass-Boston faculty. He was appointed to a full time professorship with tenure and she to a 3/4 time associate professorship in the Department of Physics. According to Mrs. Salzman, the man responsible for their recruitment, Dr. Arthur Gentile assured her that her appointment would be of a "long term" (de facto tenure) and that he has now signed a statement to that effect.

Mrs. Salzman's appointment was renewed in 1966 and 1967, but rejected in 1968 for the coming '69-'70 academic year by then Chancellor John Ryan. He stated at that time that "University policy quite clearly prohibits the contemporaneous appointment, within the same department of close relatives". The next several months saw the Salzman's appealing the decision to now Chancellor Broderick, who refused to reconsider the nonreappointment. The Salzmans took their case to the Department of Physics, a Faculty referendum, the Committee on Tenure and Grievance, and the University Senate, all of which urged the Chancellor to reconsider the decision. Upon his refusal the Board of Trustees were notified of the Senate's action in April of 1971.

In December of that year the Board adopted a statement of University Policy on Discrimination and Conflict of Interests which, in Chancellor Broderick's words, "made possible a review of Mrs. Salzman's situation", and resulted in his offering her a position as Associate Professor in the Department of Physics through August 31, 1973.

At the time of the initial appointment in 1965 the official Trustee policy concerning dual appointments prohibited contemporaneous appointments of close relatives in the same department except in "certain rare exception that should be made from time to time involving unusually qualified husband and wife teams, both of whom are proven scholars, and both of whom have held professional posts in other universities of quality." The Trustees made the appointment.

Weareoftheopinion, in the words of the Committee on Tenure and Grievance, that "because Trustee policy on dual appointments had not changed since the initial appointment, this non-reappointment notice constitutes an unwarranted abrogation of Trustee action..." Chancellor Broderick's refusal to reconsider the decision can be labeled nothing but an arbitrary administrative action that perpetrated a grievous wrong on Mrs. Salzman, and ignored the democratic processes established by faculty and university to insure security and fairness to all of academia in affairs such as this. We are therefore of the opinion that her three demands of reemployment, back pay, and tenure are the only remedies to this situation.

Human Liberation

To the Editor:

Did it ever strike you to wonder why there's a women's liberation movement and not a men's? Well, it struck me to wonder and I've come to the conclusion that it has nothing to do with whether one sex is oppressed or not, but instead the fact that it is easier to see the oppression of women since there are physical signs whereas with men it is deceptive.

Sure. Perfectly clear. You see both sexes are dehumanized by the system in this country. Men happen to be the instruments in the physical oppression of women but this does not mean that they are in turn not oppressed; it is just not so obvious.

Women have evolved into the role of second class humans: second choice for all but repetitive jobs, implied ignorance, a life style that must revolve around men, (it is conceded that they are better at expressing their emotions but this is viewed negatively). It is these obvious physical signs of oppression that have lead women to realize the fact that the system dehumanizes them. No one accepts physical oppression without being dehumanized. Hence Women's Liberation.

So women are the underdogs and therefore more liable to notice the fact that the system treats them like dogs, but men are the upperdogs. Both are within the same system and both are dehumanized. But the physical aspects are lacking for men since we are on top and, in fact, used as instruments in the dehumanization of women.

Men are taught to compete and we all realize that the purpose of competition is to win, and that if we have weaknesses we will not do so well. This being the case the socialization of men involves a process of removing our weaknesses and learning to exploit others. We all know that the greatest and most easily exploited weakness in a person are his feelings, emotions. So we have been taught to hide our emotions and fear their expression because we know that when they are expressed we run the risk of having them exploited. We do not cry, hug, we just do not talk about how we feel because the system has dehumanized us to the point where we fear it.

I think this is very real. For a long time man has been the one to work within the societal system where he cannot express his feelings without jeopardizing himself. He learns to wear a mask. The woman is protected from the competition and risks inherent in the system and therefore can express her emotions. So we have wound up having the man protecting the ability of the women to feel by absorbing the system's hurts with his "ability" not to show feeling, and the women protecting the man's sanity by administering to his emotional needs.

This leads me back to the point that both women and men are oppressed by the system but due to the man's incidental role as tool in the oppression of women, the lack of clear physical oppression, and the stifling of emotion the man does not or at least has a harder time recognizing the fact that the system dehumanizes him.

Well, last week a group of curious males gathered to try and discover a little about themselves and give each other a little help in fighting their dehumanization (actually in just realizing its presence). Hopefully this is going to continue in some form. If you are interested in rapping about the problem there will be a rap every Thursday in the basement of Baker dorm in the lounge of the residential area (north end). There is no organization-just a place and time to talk.

Justifiable

To the Editor:

In response to Mr. Krausman's letters I would like to clarify issues that he seems intent to condemn to obscurity and confusion.

First, the Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (WMPIRG) is exactly what its title implies. It is a group of students, earning academic credit, researching the broad spectrum of the public interest. They will be aided by faculty and the resources of a regional office and professional staff. It will be a coordination effort between the 20 colleges of Western Massachusetts.

The refundable taxing procedure has already been justified by Mr. Rider as the least expensive, the least expensive, the least complex and the most democratic possible. Surely it is. No other tax levied upon the student has been petitioned for by a majority of students and none allows for a refund. More importantly, none allows for the individual student to "vote" his support/non-support as this tax does every semester.

The petitioning drive currently being conducted puts a simple question before the student: do you wish to support a group that at long last will be able to effectively protect your interests and rights.

Mr. Krausman absurdly analogizes the WMPIRG tax to the Nuremberg Laws. Firstly, at last report, WMPIRG was not planning to murder anyone, but the real issue is whether or not the students of the University want to devote a small amount of their money to public interest research. We cannot emphasize enough that we have taken every precaution possible to protect the rights of the minority while still preserving the purpose for which WMPIRG was established.

Interesting Resolution

To the Editor:

Some time ago the Faculty Senate passed an interesting resolution about sensitivity training and T-Group experience on this campus.

In essence, the resolution said that Sensitivity Training and T-Groups should be entered only: a. When entrance is voluntary and completely free of duress from faculty, staff or peers, b. When entrance is subject to adequate screening to exclude those who are likely to have an unfavorable reaction, and c. When there is assurance of continuing competent leadership throughout the group experience.

These are highly commendable, although I have one strong reaction. Why aren't these same critieria applied to everything we teach here at the University?

Why can't entrance to all courses be voluntary and completely free of duress (which would eliminate "requirements" and certainly "grades".

Why can't there be adequate screening to exclude everyone in the whole university who is likely to have an unfavorable reaction, to, for example, the science requirements?

Finally, what is there now to assure us that in regular classes, as opposed to sensitivity and T-Group training classes, there is competent leadership throughout the "experience?"

The Faculty Senate raises some important issues. They just have not extended their concern to include their own teaching. Perhaps it would be too menacing to do so.

The Life Insurance Ripoff

To the Editor:

It is interesting to note the alacrity with which big business responds to the legitimate criticism set before the public by the Consumer's Union exposing life insurance to be the fraud that it is.

I have always considered legitimate criticism to be a function of a disinterested party. In this particular case the Consumer's Union takes an objective look at life insurance from the point of view of the college student. It is important to note that the Consumer's Union is a non-profit organization instituted by consumers to protect the consumer, and that the Pioneer Valley Association of Life Insurance Underwriters is an organization of big business, at the grass roots level, instituted by profiteers, to sap from the consumer the greatest amount of money possible, in order to fulfill a need created primarily by such organizations as P.V.A.L.I.U.

There is an added incentive for college students to buy life insurance: the cost is lower when you are young. This is no bargain, however. The rates are set as to accumulate the face value of the policy at age 65. That is, at age 25 you have 40 years to pay the premium of your policy. At age 45 the insured has only 20 years to pay the same amount on a comparable policy. So the latter pays twice the premium of the former. If you choose to cancel your policy before maturity, the return on your investment is considerably less than the value payed in. Profit to the company usually exceeds the premiums payed considering interest gained by the company on corporate investments made with your money. At age 65, however, you may receive from the company all the money you payed into your policy. This amount is equal to the amount of protection payed for, i.e. $10,000, $20,000, etc. However, without interest! In other words you have invested your money interest free for 40-50 years with the consolation that if you die your beneficiary will collect. But overwhelmingly statistics tell us that you will not die during this period. It is a consolation to know that the security of your family is assured, but how long will $10,00 or $20,000 last, and who can afford a $100,000 policy? With recent trends in social legislation in this country, it is highly conceivable that in less than ten years extemely comfortable living can be obtained by those in need at government expense, as is presently the case in many European countries. This would negate all together the need for life insurance.

There exists today a coalition, of which Mr. Nathan is a member, among insurance companies to maintain present inflated rates. Insurance lobbies are among the strongest in the nation, infesting Washington and our state capitals to maintain the favorable positions which they now hold. Only recently, as a campaign issue, has auto insurance been examined in this state and exposed as a fraud. It is time life insurance be exposed as the same.

To examine some tactics. Upon discharge from the service veterans may receive as many as 15 calls from independent agents asking if they would like to extend their GI life insurance. With the price of $2./mo in mind the vet may acquiesce to an interview at which time he finds the rates to be 6 to 8 times more than he payed while in service. The disabled vet on the other hand with disabilities which render him a greater risk must pay inflated rates or is unable altogether to buy insurance.

Mr. Nathan states that most college plans cover the insured even if killed in Viet Nam. This is true in 1972 due to limited US involvement in Viet Nam, however, such policies didn't exist from 1965-1970 when the odds for a soldier's survival were considerably less.

For the average college student a $10,000 policy against accidental death would cost him approx. $15./mo. If the policy was started at age 20 it would nature in 45 years at age 65 at a lifetime cost of $8,100. if purchased through an independent agent. The exact same policy could be purchased through Savings Bank Life Insurance for less than $10./mo. or $5,400. over the maturation period. A third alternative would be enter a group term policy. Such policies cover the insured for $20,000 indemnity for only $2.25/mo or $1215. over the same 45 year period.

At this point it would seem that the view of the Consumer's Union is well taken. And that Mr. Nathan is indeed representing his own vested interests. It would further appear intuitively obvious to the most casual of observers that most life insurance plans for college students are indeed bonafide frauds. I leave it to you to judge.

Alternative Life-Styles Theme At Mt. Holyoke College

By MAUREEN MEISTER

"Alternative Life-Styles" is the theme for the annual campus conference at Mount Holyoke College.

Twenty-two programs have been coordinated for February, March and April, the majority of which take place on Monday, Wednesday, and Thursday evenings.

The conference began two weeks ago on February third. Three young Americans told about their experiences while working on communes in Cuba as part of the Venceremos Brigade.

Last night, a counseling staff for creative alternative life-styles and vocations spoke. The group is called Vocations for Social Change and came from Cambridge. Organized to help Conscientious Objectors find alternative service, the counseling staff has since expanded its interests to finding free schools and drug rehabilitiation centers for interested people. In fact, Vocations for Social Change has published an entire booklet listing alternative ways of approaching normal institutions, called "The People's Yellow Pages."

According to the coordinating committee, response has been good so far and they are pleased. Between 50 and 75 people came to see "The Holy Outlaw," a film about Daniel Berrigan's four months underground after sentencing in the Catonsville Nine case. The movie was shown last Monday (Feb. 7). Another 50 people saw the movie "Automated Battlefield: Air War Slide Show" last Wednesday.

Response to the conference has been community-wide. Less than half of most audiences consist of Mount Holyoke students, and the larger half represents area students and residents.

Tonight and Thursday in Eliot House, workshops in creative non-violence will be led by Ed Guinan. Guinan is the director and founder of the Peace Study Center and the Community Center for Creative Non-Violence in Washington, D.C. The program will begin at 7:30 p.m. both evenings.

Other programs of especial interest will feature Anne Berrigan, niece of Daniel and Philip Berrigan and a member of the National Staff of the Harrisburg Defense Committee and also a concert-lecture by American Indian activist and singer Frank Growling Bear.

This year's campus conference extends until the middle of April. Originally, the conference was only to be held in February, but last year it was continued through March.

The expansion of the time devoted to the campus conference is due in part to the broad encompassing size of the topic Alternative Life-Styles.

The subject has been further broken down into more specific areas of study, including non-violence as a way of life, resistance as a way of life, alternatives to the traditional role of women, and alternatives to the family as the basic unit of society.

Another reason for extending the length of campus conference is because the committee has coordinated it with other programs. The Tuesday topics in the coming three months will reflect the theme of the conference. Also the campus lecture series has incorporated its topic on women's education with the conference.

Last Tuesday (Feb. 8), for example, the staff of the Women's Collective in Amherst spoke on their life-style. Tuesday, February 22, will feature Beverly Bell and Marjorie Shuman, unindicted co-conspirators of the Harrisburg Eight. Their speeches will concern "Women and Resistance."

Members of the committee coordinating the campus conference are Ryan Leary, Margaret Kilduff, Diane Campbell, and Sarah Morrison.

Says Sarah Morrison of the conference, "It has been really interesting so far."

Essays On "Necessary Truth"

Amherst philosophy professor has edited a collection of essays on the philosophical concept of "necessary truth."

Prof. Robert C. Sleigh, Jr., is editor of the book, "Necessary Truth," which was published in January by Prentice-Hall, Inc., in clothbound and paperback versions.

In the introduction, the editor poses two questions which he says arise from the consideration of necessary truth: "What sort of thing is it that is true or false?: What is the difference between just happening to be true and being true of necessity?"

With these questions, the editor leads the reader into 11 selections by both classical and contemporary philosophers. Among them are Immanuel Kent, Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz, and Willard Von Orman Quine.

Prof. Sleigh did his undergraduate work at Dartmouth College and received his master's degree and doctorate from Brown University. Prior to coming to UMass in 1969, he taught at Wayne State University and was a visiting professor at the University of Illinois, Dartmouth College, and Harvard University.

At UMass, he teaches an introductory course in philosophy, and courses in logic, contemporary philosophy, epistemology, and metaphysics.

Affiliated with the American Philosophical Assoc., the UMass professor has published articles in "The Journal of Philosophy," "Nous," and "Philosophical Studies."

String Quartet Rehearsal

The Tokyo String Quartet, appearing at Bowker Auditorium tonight will hold an open rehearsal this afternoon at 3:00 p.m. in Bowker. They will perform Quartet No. 2 by the contemporary Japanese composer, Akira Miyoshi. There will be no admission charge for the rehearsal.

For their University debut concert, the quartet will perform Mozart's Quartet in B Flat Major, K. 589; Debussy's Quartet in G Minor, and Miyoshi's Quartet No. 2.

Reserved tickets for the concert are available at the Fine Arts Council, 125 Herter Hall, Tel. 545-0202. Prices: $1 UMass Undergrads; $2 Other Full-time Students; $3 UMass Faculty/Staff; $3.50 General Public. Remaining tickets will be availalbe at Bowker Auditorium one hour before the concert.

This event marks the third of five concerts in this season's Chamber Music Series sponsored by the Fine Arts Council.

Augusta Security Unit Closed

AUGUSTA, Maine (AP)-Don, a patient at Augusta State Hospital, glanced around in the near-empty corridor of the maximum security unit at 9:30 Tuesday morning. "I'm lonely," he said, moving to collect his belongings stuffed in two paper cartons.

A few minutes later, Don walked out of the 63-year-old brick-and granite fortress, the last patient to leave the archaic structure, which will be torn down.

Minutes earlier, five other male patients had gathered their possessions in cartons and white laundry bags and walked out of "the max." Attendants opened two gates leading out of the structure, which is ringed with a 20-foot fence topped by barbed wire.

They will be assigned to other quarters "on the hill," as they refer to a cluster of buildings which comprise the mental hospital.

The maximum security unit gained nationwide publicity last fall when it was discovered that a patient, 66-year-old Melvin Whittum, had been mistakenly confined there for 44 years. The story was broken by a reporter for the Daily Kennebec Journal in Augusta.

Whittum, who had been transferred to the hospital from the Maine State prison, was subsequently released.

Roy A. Ettlinger, ASH superintendent, said closing the maximum security facility means "more efficient treatment for this type of patient..." He added: "We realize we have a great responsibility to protect the public, and I am convinced that the new program will offer greater protection and at the same time provide better treatment."

But to the patients the move "up the hill" isn't the boon it might seem.

"You lose more than you gain up on the hill," said Don. He was committed to the hospital 20 months ago after a jury found him innocent of a charge of murder by reason of mental disease.

"I was up there for three weeks," he said. "Some of the privileges you have down here you lose up there," he added, referring to the need for tighter security precautions outside "the max".

The six-story building, built in 1908, has held as many as 42 patients, although it is rated for a maximum of 27.

Last fall, a task force recommended closing the facility down.

French Lecture Series Held

The second in a series of lectures on French civilization reflected in literature will be given Wednesday evening, Feb. 16, at 8:00 in Herter 231 by Professor Aline Allard. Professor Allard is a specialist in sixteenth century French literature, and will be speaking on the image of the Renaissance in French literature.

These lectures are being given in response to student request: they are aimed at a student audience, not an audience of specialists. They will try to give the undergraduate student in French literature some sense of the relationship between the literature of a particular period and the main cultural and political movements of that period. Most of the literary references will be taken from works studied in the 171-172 course, but students from other courses are welcome to attend.

Professor Allard will speak in French.

Community Police Control Proposed

POLICY

The policing policy for the community should limit the Police Department's power to providing for the safety and personal liberties of all persons present within the boundaries of the community. The laws, the courts, and the penalties should seek the same ends.

MEASURES

1. A Representative Police Force. A civilian Police Affairs Board should be established with one year terms of office representing the various populations within the community. The Board should hire and fire all police officers including the police chief. Members of the various populations within the community should be hired proportionately as police: to include students, blacks, all racial minorities, women, "hippies," "greasers," and the elderly.

2. No Guns. No person in public within the community including any police officer should be permitted to carry a firearm unless for special cause such as licensed hunting, the transfer of cash at banks, or for the use of police in the case of an imminent threat of bodily harm to persons by an armed outlaw.

3. No Secret Police. No person employed by or in the control of the police department should hide his police identity for any purpose including surveillance or the detection or solution of any crime whatever its nature.

4. Arrest Procedures Law. A local law should specifically prohibit:

(1) an arbitrary stop of any person or vehicle by a policeman.

(2) a search or seizure of any property that is unrelated to the offense charged.

(3) unnecessary arrest and lock-up for minor offenses when a summons should be issued.

(4) the exclusion of a friend as witness and advisor during an arrest and the entire period of lock-up.

(5) the failure to provide a telephone inside the cell.

(6) taking a confession without the advice of a lawyer.

5. Personal Liberties Law. A local law should provide:

(1) No conduct is disorderly, no matter how unconventional, unless it intentionally obstructs and prevents the exercise of a personal liberty by another person excluding the police officer.

(2) The community government shall make no law abridging the right to exercise personal liberties, to include:

(a) being nude on any private property with the owner's consent and being nude at designated public places.

(b) sexual acts of any manner between consenting persons 16 years of age and over.

(c) any conduct that may be construed to be self-destructive including the use of any drugs.

6. Law Enforcement Priorities. A community-wide referendum should set the following priorities for police work:

First. The safety of persons from physical harm by another person or from natural causes.

Second. The safety of property from theft or damage by another person or from natural causes.

Third. The protection of personal liberties. (See Personal Liberties Law, Proposal #5 above.)

Fourth. A helping hand extending to all persons within the community including guests and passers-by.

Drug Policy. The policy of the community government should be to enforce no law making the use or sale of any drug a criminal offense.

(a) When drug use is a problem it is a health problem so the local government should provide medical and social services for users who voluntarily seek assistance.

(b) No controls should be placed on the sale of marijuana and other natural psychedelics.

(c) The community should explore what controls, if any, should be put on the sale of clean synthetic psychedelics and "hard" drugs.

(d) The community should devise non-criminal controls to stop a person from dealing an adulterated drug especially one containing poison.

7. Review of Criminal Complaints. The Police Affairs Board (see proposal #1 above) should review at a public hearing any protest by a defendant to a criminal complaint against him. In the case of a complaint filed by a police officer, the decision by the Board whether the complaint should be prosecuted is final.

In the case of a complaint filed by a private person, the decision of the Board whether the complaint should be prosecuted is advisory to the complaining person and the District Attorney.

8. A Unified Community Police Department. The University of Massachusetts should contract with the Town of Amherst for police services which are controlled by all residents within the Town.

9. Hometown Court. A Hometown Court for all criminal and civil matters should be established in the Town of Amherst with local judges including non-lawyers appointed for a two-year term of office. The jury list of local people should reflect the various local populations proportionately.

10.10. Hometown Penalty Program. In the case of actual wrongdoing the wrongdoer should pay a penalty of which jail is the last resort. Penalties should generally compensate the victim for the wrong done.

Plan Your Career Now

By PHILIP SCHIRMER

Undergraduates.

Last week's article focused primarily on the Career Planning and Placement Office's services with regard to graduating seniors, and was essentially "placement" oriented. But, as the title indicates, placement is only half of the picture.

Career "planning"-the other half-is a service of value to all segments of the academic community here at UMass.: undergraduates, graduates, and alumni, but especially for freshman to junior level students.

The CPPO, according to its brochure, "...assists the individual to choose a career, prepare for it, enter upon it, and progress in it." It states further that "student(s) should plan to start making use of career planning resources as early as possible, for certain options might require prerequisites that cannot be scheduled if left until the final semesters before graduation." (Those little prerequisites have a way of sneaking in on you.)

Choosing a career which will be satisfying and rewarding 20 or 30 years from now is not a simple process. Placement officers can refer you to these individuals and, once you have made your decision, help you plan a job campaign. They receive regularly, requests from interested employers for students to work on a full or part-time basis, as well as information on summer job openings.* These, and other special services are available to UMass alumni as well, at any time during their careers.

To supplement counselling services, the (CPPO) maintains a library containing such things as: company brochures, aids on the mechanics of job-hunting, graduate school directories, and the like. The library is situated to the left as you enter the Placement Office in Whitmore and students are urged to come in and browse.

Much as we would like to, we can't all be professional students. Neither can we afford to look upon our UMass experience as purely academic and unrelated to the future beyond the University. Career planning-now-can help us avoid or at least minimize the inevitable post-graduate job-hunting pressure.

*On February 23, a representative from the New York City Mission Society will conduct interviews in the CPP office for summer camping positions. Sign up for an interview if interested.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

An Aquarian named Karen communicates from Mifflinburg, Pa., to complain about Leo natives. "Leo," she says, "always wants a crowd and everyone in the crowd to think the same way Leo does." Karen says she gets along with her Leo father by making him think he is always right. "I won't," she says, "go into the matter of his roaring temper." These seem not to be good days for Leo, at least not as far as some of my readers are concerned. Your opinions, please!

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Work behind scenes. One associated with large organization may be striving in your behalf. Don't pull in too many directions at once. Settle in your own mind where it is you want to go.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Friendships can blossom. What appears a minor relationship could become meaningful. Socialize. Welcome contacts. Be confident. Expand. Don't shrink. You are ready. Know it and act like you know it.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Ambitions should be put in proper perspective. Find out what it is that will make you happy. Discard the rest. Get rid of platitudes. Stick to what can achieve your goal. Think of yourself. Others will appreciate your practicality.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Study, gain additional knowledge. Publish and advertise. Improve methods of communication. Be aware of potential. Accept need for creative changes. Be analytical. Get to heart of matters. Travel is emphasized.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Overcome habits which are destructive. Get budget in order. Family member is ready to make concession. Be diplomatic. State desires, but do so in reasonable manner. Others now resent brash methods.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Study. Leo message. Find reasons for recent happenings. Perfect techniques. Improve public relations. Co-operate in special project which involves mate, business partner. Spotlight on legal agreement.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): New work procedures are featured. Employment picture changes. You get on more solid ground. You gain confidence and are given added responsibility. Order individual will aid. Be a good listener.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Finish what you start. Don't play games where emotions are concerned. Stakes are high and could be for keeps. Aries is involved. Creative urge soars to forefront. Get rid of burden not rightly you own.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec.21): Spotlight is on home, security, basic chores and procedures. Get facts in order. organize and co-ordinate efforts. Older individual may be temperamental. Do what must be done. Refuse to be coerced.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Accent on short journeys, ideas which can be successfully nurtured. You make numerous contacts. Be ready and willing to deal with public. You could sell anything. Humor and versatility become twin allies.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): New deal upcoming which can be profitable. New moon position now accents money, personal possessions, material gain. Be open to suggestions, but guard valuables. Don't give up something for nothing.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): New moon is your sign coincides with added vitality, personal appearances and general success. Make new starts in new directions. You are going to break through red tape, other obstacles.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are inventive, creative and introspective. You require periods alone. Some seclusion is beneficial. You get second chance for personal happiness in upcoming months. July is most significant. Be independent and confident that original concepts will work.

Answer to Yesterday's Puzzle

Distr. by United Feature Syndicate, Inc.

It's Hard To Keep An Old Broad Jumper Down

LOUISVILLE, Ky. (AP) — Ralph Boston isn't used to taking a back seat to anyone in the long jump.

But during the Mason-Dixon Games here last weekend the 32-year-old former world record holder and three-time Olympian finished fifth--well out of the running.

"That's the first time I've finished fifth in 12 years," said the lanky, agile athlete wearing a slight grin across his goateed face.

"Check that. I remember placing sixth in the national AAU championships in 1960."

Boston, presently working in the special services office handling minority affairs at the University of Tennessee, is returning to active competition after a two year layoff.

"I just got a little tired of jumping," he said. "My body was tired and I felt I had to take some time off to let it rebuild."

His right knee gave him trouble beginning in the mid-60s and then he damaged some tendons during a European tour in 1967.

Finally, "wear and tear" on the knees, said Boston, forced him to go slow.

Last week he said he had his right knee drained and now feels in better shape than any time since the 1968 Mexico City Olympics.

"I had full flexibility. I could actually spring," he said standing next to the long jump ramp.

Working out every day for as much as 1-1/2 hours, Boston has only one though at the moment--the summer Olympics in Munich.

"There's nothing else but Munich," he said.

Can he take it after a two year layoff and with a knee that still aches in the cold, damp weather?

"I wouldn't be trying if I didn't think I could," he smiled. "Guys are getting out of wheelchairs for the trials. Look at me."

He didn't name any long jumpers he must beat out.

Boston, who jumped 24-4-3/4 in the Mason-Dixon classic, felt that "anything other than first is disappointing."

"Now I know what I've got to do," he said.

Boston turned quickly to another area he feels strongly about--money.

"If I get some backing financially, I could go as long as George Blanda," he said, referring to the 44-year-old quarterback of the Oakland Raiders.

"There's money being made in these track meets but where is it. There must be some for me," he grinned.

Boston declined to say how much he earns as an official at Tennessee, but admitted "it's not enough."

He talked of Bob Hayes, his college roommate, and the $25,000 check he picked up after the Dallas Cowboys won this year's Super Bowl.

"Nobody thinks about the poor, lonely track guy," he said. "Track athletes are human."

"I don't think Sandy Koufax former Los Angeles Dodger pitcher was any better a pitcher than I was a long jumper, but he's earning thousands of dollars as a sports commentator," Boston said.

Marquette Receives A First Place Vote

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UCLA lost a first-place vote in The Associated Press poll announced Tuesday but still retained the position as the top major college basketball team in the nation by a wide margin.

The Bruins, unanimous No. 1 choice for the past three weeks in the balloting of sports writers and sportscasters, received 40 first-place votes and 818 points. Marquette received the other No. 1 vote and 720 points. Both were unbeaten in 19 games through Sunday.

North Carolina, Louisville, Pennsylvania and Virginia finished in the same 3-4-5-6 order as last week. But South Carolina advanced from ninth to seventh, Ohio State dropped one place to eighth, Long Beach State fell from eighth to ninth and Marshall cracked the Top Ten with 10th place.

The remainder of the Top Twenty is Brigham Young, Southwestern Louisiana, Providence, Florida State, Missouri, Hawaii, Kentucky, Memphis State, Maryland and Tennessee.

Kentucky, Maryland and Tennessee gained the Top Twenty this week, while Minnesota, Duquesne and Jacksonville dropped out.

Women Hoopsters Drop Two To Southern

The UMass varsity girls basketball team lost its fifth game of the season last Saturday against a strong Southern Connecticut State College, 67-29.

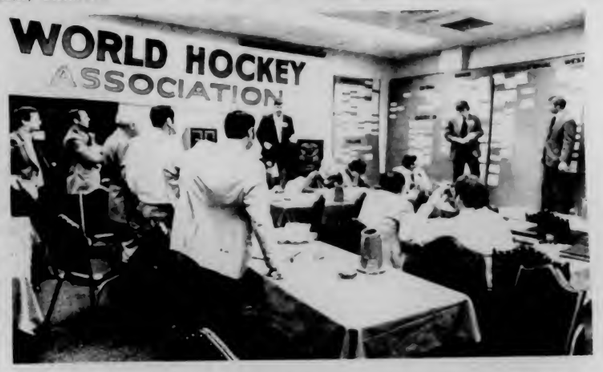
The game was by no means out of UMass reach by half-time with Southern on top, 30-21. The scoring of Beth Fay (12 pts.) and Vicki Pagel (4 pts.) had kept UMass in the game until this point.

But with the opening of the third quarter, Southern's offense hit for a big 20 points while UMass countered with just 7. In the quarter, Sue Chapman, Beth Fay and Pat Bash scored three, two, and two points respectively.

By the fourth quarter, the UMass offense had turned ice cold as they could muster but one lone point from Chris Molonea. Southern's 17 points put the icing on their 67-29 victory, and dropped UMass to 0-5 for the season.

GIRLS' J.V. BASKETBALL

The UMass J.V.'s faired little better against their Southern Conn counterparts, losing 49-26 and dropping their season record to 2-3.



The half-time score stood at 27-15, UMass on the bottom. Sheila Higgins and Sue McNamara spearheaded the offense with four points apiece.

The J.V.'s were outscored in the last two quarters as their usually competent offense could not get hot. UMass scorers included Sherrie Kowarski, Sue McNamara and Joanne McGowan with five apiece, Sheila Higgins' four points, followed by Kathy Dowd, Lorraine Harvey and Karen Fruzetti with two each and Shawn Stillman's one point contribution. Final score, Southern Conn 49, UMass 26.

Mrs. Kjeldsen Named to Tour For U.S. Women Gymnasts

Mrs. Kitty Kjeldsen, administrative coach of the UMass women's gymnastics team, has been asked to serve on the national women's coaches and judges training staff for the United States. The training staff, consisting of six women's coaches and judges picked by the United States Gymnastics Federation, will be asked to travel and conduct coaches clinics, judging workshops and judges rating sessions all over the country for the next four years. The program is a part of the overall effort to make the United States one of the top countries in the world in men's and women's gymnastics.

Mrs. Kjeldsen has already been asked to conduct coaches and judges clinics in Moscow, Idaho and for the state of Vermont. She has also been chosen to judge the Junior National Gymnastics Championships in Baltimore, Maryland and Senior National Gymnastics Championships in Billings, Montana. These championships will serve as selection meets for the United States Women's Olympic Team.

UMass Rebounds Vs. B.U., 112-89

By FRANK ANTOSIEWICZ

After three tough losses on the road, Coach Jack Leaman juggled his line up in an attempt to find a winning combination, and came up with the lucky number-a 112-89 win.

Playing before a small crowd in the Cage, the Redmen relished the idea of being home, at last, and ran off nine straight points enroute to a 54-38 halftime lead.

In the first half the front court came through with Charlie Peters, Al Skinner and Tom McLaughlin controlling the boards. Peters at 6'7 held 6'8 Jim Garvin, who was averaging 11 points a game and 15 rebounds, to only 2 rebounds. The Topsfield native was also immense standing in the hub of the offense, handling the ball to take some of the pressure off the back court.

The second half began with the lead dropping to six on the fine overall play of sophomore Terrier Bobby Boyd. The cagers came back to pressure Boston University into foul trouble. With just over eleven minutes to play, the dribblers were the recipients of the bonus one-and-one situation and took advantage of it hitting 24-32 freethrows or 75%.

From this point on the lead mounted steadily. Peters fouled out of the game with just under seven minutes left, but for all practical purposes the game was over.

The crowd, as has been the custom this year, sat back, enjoyed the game, until the century mark was neared, then the mercenary menagerie began cheering wildly. (Maybe we should start the game at 100-100) A behind the back pass from Skinner to Coffin for the layup enthralled the spectators. Lastly, the sophs, Skinner and Peter Trow finished the triple figure scoring.

Coach Jack Leaman was all smiles after the game. When asked to comment on his team's play, the alumnus of BU said, "We needed this game badly. The insertion of Charlie Peters and Peter Trow into the lineup shook up the others. They played with some enthusiasm and looked like they enjoyed playing. The hustling attitude was infectious and affected the other starters."

Leaman continued, "Our forwards are not big enough to outmuscle the big men. The use of Peters served to intimidate Garvin and allow the other forwards to clear the boards." Coach Leaman also had words of praise for Al Skinner and Tom McLaughlin. He said, "Tom has been playing very well for us, even in our losses."

A look at the starting five revealed that John Betancourt missed starting a game for the first time since he was a sophomore in the back court with Ray Ellerbrook. John injured his ankle against UConn and was able to see only limited action last night. It is expected that Betancourt will be ready for RI.

Coach Leaman asked after the game, "When was the last time we hit 60% of our shots?" The answer, "Today (last night), of course." There's no place like home.

Frosh Romp Pups, 101-82

By FRED ROSENTHAL

After leading by eight points at the half, the UMass freshman hoopsters had to fight off a tough second half rally by Boston University before coasting to a 101-82 win at the Cage last night. The UMass victory was the twelfth of the year against no defeats.

With Jim Burke shutting off BU's sensational Kerry Walker the Little Redmen broke open a close game midway through the second half (12 points in the first half). Up to that point Walker and 5'8 guard Lance Tucker had kept the game real close for the Little Terriers.

Coach Fan Gaudette was forced to go with several reserves late in the game because UMass' two big men, Tom Gillams and John Murphy, plus guard Bill Endicott, were in foul trouble. UMass played for several crucial minutes with Dave Dibble, Rich Boron, Burke, Mike Flanagan, and Bruce Guzowski. The second stringers came through in fine style and actually clinched the win for UMass. Gaudette was especially pleased with the play of Rick Boron. "He played a hell of a game."

Double Dribbles: Showing the most balanced attack they've had all year the Little Redmen placed seven men in double figutes. Endicott led the way with 19 followed by Gillams (17), Flanagan (15), Murphy (13) , Boron (11), and Burke and Dibble with ten each...Bu's Walker had been averaging over 40 points per game before being held to 16 by Burke last night...Burke also led all rebounders with 16.

It's Official: Bowdoin Will Not Defend Puck Titles

By BILL BALLOU

It's official.

The Bowdoin College Polar Bears, who have been threatening a boycott of the Division II playoffs, will not defend their Divisional championship.

The spector of a defending champion, whose record is one of the best in the division, not defending its championship, is unpleasant. But the Polar Bears, although they insist they want to defend their crown, say that ECAC expansion makes participation in the playoffs impossible.

Bowdoin won the divisional title last year in the old system of only the four top teams. This year the format is to be the eight top teams vying for the championship, but the feeling at the Maine college is that it will involve too much travel and too much time away from classes.

However, the new format involves only one more game than the old format, and the time span involved is just a matter of seven days between March 4 and March 11.

Not only is Bowdoin out of the post-season tourney, but Amherst, Colby, Hamilton, Middlebury and Williams have also decided against participating. These six schools form the hockey playing section of the New England Small College Athletic Conference. In recent years the NESCAC has approved participation only in four-team play-offs.

Roger Howell, Jr., President of Bowdoin College, contends that it is the ECAC who is holding the Bears out of the play-offs. Howell and other NESCAC members had been working toward a compromise measure where only the six top teams would make the playoffs, with the two top seeds drawing an opening round bye.

Daily Collegian

SPORTS

The ECAC would not compromise, however, and the eight team playoff stood. The ECAC decision prompted Howell to reply that "I have personally made every effort to enable our team to defend its championship. Like the members of the team, I have always felt that men of good will could arrive at a reasonable compromise.

"However, ECAC has shown itself to be completely inflexible on this point. They were advised of the NESCAC position long before they decided to expand the tournament. Their decision to change the format of the tournament was not officially communicated to the colleges concerned until the end of December."

The members of the Bowdoin team revealed that they had sent a personal plea to the ECAC asking them to delay the implementation of the new system for a year. The ECAC reviewed the letter and the personal plea of President Howell, but decided to reaffirm their decision.

In spite of the obvious desire of the players and officials at Bowdoin, as well as their opponents, to have the Polar Bears included in the playoffs, Howell feels that Bowdoin "is honor bound to observe the ruling of NESCAC. One cannot simply break an agreement on short notice just because it would suit one's purpose to do so; if the College did that there would be no credibility to any agreement it entered into. That would not be the Bowdoin you and I respect."

It appears the Bears are fighting a losing battle. They want to play in the post-season tourney, but are being kept out by an agreement with five other schools who don't figure to make the playoffs anyway. The Bears are counting on the rest of Division II to put up such a clamor that the ECAC will be forced to change its playoff format.

They'd better not count on it. There are plenty of good teams in the Division who are hungry for a playoff spot and are willing to play anyone, anywhere, for that chance. It is unfortunate that a team of the caliber of Bowdoin can't be in the playoffs, but when a college can start dictating to the ECAC, then that organization is in trouble.

Bowdoin is going to find out that it needs the ECAC more than the ECAC needs them.

Three Crewmen Invited To Compete For Olympic Berths

Three UMass Juniors will be among approximately 40 collegiate and club oarsmen competing this weekend in Cambridge for nominations to the national rowing team which will travel in Europe and race at the Olympics this summer. Preliminary testing for seats in the 8 man and 4 man shells begins simulataneously this weekend at seven sites around the country. All candidates will be tested on ergometers which are machines which measure work output in rowing. Tank sessions will allow the selectors to watch the individuals style. Approximately 200 people nationwide have been invited to attend. Al Flanders, Billy Moran, and Ted Fitzpatrick have been selected from the UMass squad.

Flanders, 6'4" - 195, is a Junior P. E. major from Waltham, Mass. In high school he played hockey and had no previous experience in rowing before college. Last year he rowed in Varsity boat.

Moran, 6'2" - 200, from Hicksville, New York is majoring in Mechanical Engineering. Played basketball and football in high school. In his third year of rowing, he rowed in the Varsity boat most of last year.

Fitzpatrick, 6'2" - 205, hails from Walpole, Mass, where he was President of his senior class and a member of the football team. Served two years with the Marines before attending college. Rowed Varsity last year. Majoring in Russian.

Coach Mike Faherty is realistic about the trio's chances of surviving all the cuts to make the squad. "They've been working together for one year now but still lack much of the experiences necessary to be successful. This will be good exposure for them."

Student Senate Moves Towards Re-organization

By MARY SMITH

The Student Senate last night passed a preliminary motion towards reorganizing the executive and legislative functions of the Senate. Presented as an amendment to the by-laws, the motion will not become effective until a similar Constitutional Amendment is passed next month.

In other business, the Senate voted to fund the Science Fiction Club, Black Mass Communications and the Drum, a magazine geared to the black community. An additional bill concerning the release of funds from last year's interium concert committee to the Spring Concert Committee was committed to the Finance Committee for one week after lengthy debate on the matter.

The amendment to the by-laws was sponsored jointly by President Sandwen, Senators Mulligan and Stevens, and Vice-Presidents Hogan and Ladd, who withdrew his support during the debate. The amendment, once in effect, will abolish the office of Administrative Vice-President and in its place establish three special assistants to the Senate President. The Special Assistants, to be appointed by the Senate President, with the approval of the entire Senate, will each function in a specific area. The assistants will be voting members of the Executive Committee.

The amendment also provides for the establishment of the office of Speaker of the Senate. The Speaker, a post similar to the present Legislative Vice-President, will be directly responsible for the Senate. In addition to controlling the Senate, the speaker, along with the Committee on Governmental Affairs, will be responsible for making appointments to committees and keeping files on all bills passed by the Senate. All appointments to committees and chairmanships must be met by Senate approval and are subject to presidential veto.

Proponents of the amendment argued that the bill was an attempt to bring the office of Senate President closer to the entire student body. Although the President will still be elected by the Senate and remain as second presiding officer, he will be able to act more directly in the interests of the students as a whole.

Opposing the motion, Senator Chiller maintained that the Senate had not given the present system enough time to tell how receptive it was to the needs of the University. Senate Treasurer Olmstead joined the opposition stating that the present system functions reasonably well, and to reorganize the executive branch in such a manner will lead to more disorganization.

Senate Vice-President John Hogan, a co-sponsor of the bill, summed up support for the amendment. Refuting the charge that the President will bet too removed from the Senate, Hogan claimed that under the new structure the President will still be responsible to the Senate, while simultaneously working in the interests of the student body. The question was called and passed by the needed two-thirds majority.

In budgetary matters, the Senate passed a motion to fund Drum, on the rationale that the magazine, the only one of its kind in the area, provides the black community with a relevant, quality magazine. Also funded were the Science Fiction Club, which operates a library of 4,000 books, and Black Mass Communications.

Debate on the Concert Committee was centered on which source would provide the funds. The bill, as submitted, called for the funds to be released from last year's Concert Committee, totalling approximately $3,000. An amendment to the bill proposed that the funds be released only if the Area Governments could not provide the funds.

After much debate concerning the feasibility of asking the Area Governments to provide the funds, the bill was submitted to the Finance Committee for consideration.

U.S.-U.S.S.R. Relations Discussed

By ETHEL HARRIS

"The Soviet Union and the U.S.: Toward Negotiation or Confrontation" was the topic of the panel discussion held last night in Webster lounge as part of the 1972 Great Decisions series. Approximately thirty attended the program, sponsored by the Orchard Hill area government and broadcast over WFCR.

Luther Allen of the UMass political sciences department was Moderator of the panel. Panelists included Robert McNeal of the UMass history department; and William Taubman of the Amherst College political science department.

Professor McNeal discussed our present concept of a "cold war" as a mistake in foreign policy which should be ended. In McNeal's opinion, the "cold war" was successful in the sense that it prevented a "real" war--i.e. armed hostilities.

McNeal also claimed that Andre Gromyko, the Soviet chief diplomat since 1957, is largely responsible for the continuation of "stable antagonism" betwen the U.S. and Russia. He said, "Gromyko has helped maintain peace between the two nations."

Professor Ryavek discussed the objective reasons for agreements between the United States and Soviet Union. Agreements between the two nations; include those pertaining to naval power, outer space, and a general outline of the SALT talks. He also discussed disagreements--new weapons systems, the possibility of an orbiting bomb, and competition in the Middle East and Southeast Asia.

Ryavek explained that many of the problems faced by the U.S. and the Soviet Union are similar because they are both post-industrial societies. Also, both nations are plagued with internal dissent and are trying to gain allies by military and economic aid to uncommitted nations.

Professor Taubman said that the U.S. and the Soviet Union both need to reorder domestic priorities; at the same time, development of new weaponry by the Soviets impels the U.S. to arm even further. Both are also concerned with the growth of developing nations. China has become the focus of attention for the two powers; according to Taubman, one of Nixon's reasons for visiting China is "to tweak the Soviet nose". Finally, the development of Western Europe and Japan has caused the U.S. to seek favorable relations with these nations, while at the same time, encouraging their independence.

In order to reach a "second stage of detente", however, Taubman feels that several assumptions of the U.S. must be re-examined. Not all areas of the world are vital to our security; even in the so-called vital areas, the Soviets may find "their reach exceeds their grasp"; he cited Latin America and Western Europe as examples. Many areas where cooperation is possible still exist, such as trade, Taubman said.

Chief questions from the audience included the issue of the arms build-up. Taubman claimed that each incident of what appears to be a missile build-up should not be blown out of proportion. He cited the Cuba incident as an example. Ryavek noted that "what's true in politics is what men think is true" regarding the arms race. He referred to such expansion as "mindless bureaucratic creep".

The next panel discussion in the series will be held on February 16th in Webster lounge at 7:30 p.m. The topic will be "Chile's Marxist Experiment".

Women Get Together On Abortion

By MARILYNN MARTIN

"Abortion: The Right To Choose" was the theme of a National Conference of WONAAC, The Women's National Abortion Action Coalition, at Boston University last weekend where women congregated to vote on new resolutions, exchange experiences concerning the coalition and attend workshops.

Starting off Friday night (Feb. 11) with a rally, the conference proceeded, on Saturday, to announce various proposals, open general workshops, where these resolutions were discussed, and set up Project and Constituency Workshops based on the ideas of National Legislation, Court Actions, Forced Sterilization, Clinics, Referrals, Contraception, and various others.

The goals of WONAAC included: working on a National level to make abortion legal, to end restrictive contraceptive laws and to end forced sterilization.

Relating to these goals were a number of arguments brought up in papers and leaflets distributed. The fact that "until about 100 years ago, abortion was an accepted form of population control and the present position of the Catholic Church (probably the strongest opposition to WONAAC) wasn't taken until 1869" was one idea discussed. Also brought up was the reason for the first laws in U.S. against abortion in 1821, which was "to insure protection of the mother's life and health."

Still another mentioned that "Medical Science had now progressed to the degree where the abortion procedure is now safer than the childbirth procedure."

In one workshop, concerning "Contraception", various means were discussed and evaluated. The major problem on which everyone present seemed to agree, was the fact that there is at the present time, no adequate form of birth control available.

Ruth Strauss, a graduate student at B.U., currently working on her masters in vasectomy and hysterectomy and present at the workshop, led the discussion on various side effects and delayed reactions to the pill, noting as one example, "the use of women as experimental guinea pigs" in researching methods such as the pill. "These contraceptive devices have not been researched fully", she emphasized, "before they were on the market for public use." She noted one example in a pill developed (now off the market) containing stilbestrol which didn't show an effect on the mother or her son, but did on her daughter. When the child reached puberty, definite signs of cancer were detected in her body. This was found in a substantial number of offspring.

The diaphragm, being discussed in the group also, was found to be 70% effective with 99% of the 30% failure rate due to the woman's improper handling of it (wrong positioning, etc.).

One of the main purposes of the conference, as a whole, was to discuss and vote on proposals developed by various individuals and groups across the U.S.

Some of these included:

1) The HEW Proposal

Under the "Family Planning and Research Act", as it now stands, "No funds appropriated under this title shall be used in programs where abortion is a method of family planning."

WONAAC argues that the bill is vague and its interpretation inconsistent, noting that if they (HEW) decide, they can cut off the funding of Planned Parenthood, Clinics, and any Abortion Counsel and Referral related agencies that they wish.

They argue that this bill should be considered more carefully and given a definite form in writing.

In a proposal suggested by Bella Abzug, submitted to Congress as the "Abortion Rights Act of 1972", a bill that would override all laws which impose sanctions upon those who chose to exercise their individual right to obtain an abortion.

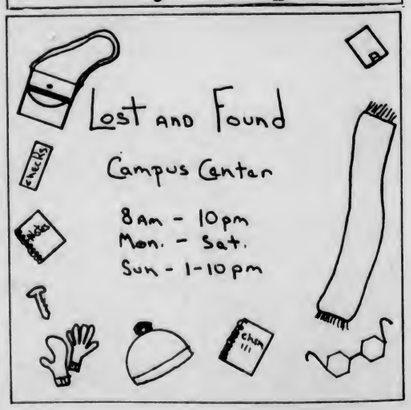
WONAAC is working on these and other proposals and currently preparing for an "Abortion Action Week" to take place from May 1-6 and include local or regional rallies or demonstrations, high school programs on contraception, protests, speakouts, hearings, etc.

The Conference came to an end Sunday with organizational workshops and a general assembly to discuss implementation of these proposals.

Dubois Lecture Tonight

Dr. Herbert Aptheker will deliver the sixth lecture in the DuBois Lecture Series this Thursday, February 17, 1972, 8:00 P.M. in Thompson Hall 106. Presented by the Department of Afro-American Studies, the lectures introduce to the university community the life and work of Dr. W.E.B. DuBois, sociologist, historian, novelist, and activist. Herbert Aptheker was a close friend and comrade of DuBois, and is now the literary executor of his works. In the five preceding lectures Dr. Aptheker has discussed DuBois' major writings; his organizational efforts involving the Niagara Movement and the N.A.A.C.P.; his historic confrontations with Booket T. Washington and his basic ideas on racism, capitalism, and prisons. In tonight's lecture on "DuBois and Africa", Dr. Aptheker will discuss DuBois writings on and his program for organization and action towards Pan-Africanism.

Local Candidates Debate Tonight



There will be a "candidates debate" tonight among the four candidates running for Selectmen and the two candidates running for School Committee, in next Tuesday's Amherst town elections. The debate will be held at 8:00 p.m. in the Amherst Regional Junior High Auditoriums. All University students are cordially invited to attend.

Tuition Increase Going To Legislature

By DONALD BISHOP

The subject of tuition increases in state schools for next year, is one that will be building in intensity in the coming weeks. Opposition to a tuition increase seems to be less this year among the legislators on Beacon Hill and the question on many students minds would appear to be not whether there will be an increase but rather how much it will be.

All tuition bills to date are scheduled to go before a hearing of the Joint Committee of Education scheduled for March 7th. (two bills were already discussed at a previous hearing on Feb. 2) There will be a total of 38 bills presented at that time, 12 of which deal specifically with the question of tuition. The other bills deal with the topics of loans and scholarships for state school students.

As each bill is presented at the Hearing, individuals (whether in favor or opposed to the specific bills) will be allowed to voice their opinions. After this hearing, all bills, whether there was debate on them or not, will be submitted to a legislative executive committee hearing, which is closed to the public.

According to USCC, (University and State Communications Council) it will be at this closed door session that one bill will be revised and amended, for final presentation on the floor of the State Legislature. In all likelihood the executive committee will submit only one bill to the legislature, provided that they do not accept the tuition proposal of the Governor, which he has promised to submit to the Joint Committee of Education before the March 7th hearing. Although it is not known at this time what kind of a tuition increase the Governor's Office will propose, it is clear that it would carry great weight, both with the executive committee and with the Legislature itself.

Another tuition increase proposal that would have considerable weight would be one coming out of the Board of Trustees. Nothing has come from the Trustees yet, but the people from USCC feel that there will be some statement on tuition from the Board in the near future.

The tuition proposals scheduled to come up at the March 7th hearing include one "deferred payment" proposal sponsored by Rep. Hatch and a "free tuition" proposal by Rep. Craven, which has been submitted and rejected five years in a row. There are no flat increase bills, although it is possible that the Governor may come out with one.

The feeling in USCC is that the Republicans at this point are supporting the idea of deferred payment tuition increase while the Democrats are also leaning this way.

What deferred tuition would mean is that for those students unable to afford an increase above the present $200 rate, the amount above the $200 would be deferred until after the student's graduation. The Hatch deferred increase bill would increase the tuition rate "to between 40-60% of the actual instructional cost." This figure has yet to be determined.

Rep. Charles Long has submitted a bill to the Education Committee which would raise tuition at UMass to $2000. In a rather complicated procedure, students who feel they are unable to afford this amount could file a parent's confidential statement. The state would then take the student's parent's income, subtract $4000 outright, then subtract $2000 for each child in the family, take 10% of this number, and come out with a final figure.

With a family making $14,000 with four children, you would subtract $4000, then $8000 for the number of children. 10% of the final $2000 would leave the student with a figure of $200, or exactly the amount he pays for tuition now. This particular bill would not affect any student until freshmen of the Class of 1977. It is just one of the 12 to be heard on March 7th, and it is impossible to predict the likelihood of its ever being adopted.

As far as USCC stands on any tuition increase, they would only say that they will be doing what they feel is in the best interest of students here. They haven't seen all the proposals yet, and will have to wait until after the hearing before they decide their course of action.

This weekend students from all state schools in the commonwealth will be gathering at UMass to discuss the whole tuition increase situation. Workshops and meetings will be held mainly to educate all in attendance about the various bills before the Legislature and to begin planning a course of action for fighting the tuition increase.

Nader Aide Stresses Need For Public Interest Groups

By STEVE TRIPOLI

Don Ross, one of Ralph Nader's top attorneys and a coordinator of the Public Interest Research Group (PIRG) movement yesterday spoke to Professor Fergus Clydesdale's Food Science 101 class on the reasons an organization such as WMPIRG is needed in the Western Massachusetts area.

Most of the period was spent citing instances of the abuses which the average consumer is forced to face in the course of his daily existence in the form of products and services that he buys and advertising that he is exposed to. Some of the more blatant examples he mentioned include:

——A leading cereal which has little to no nutritional value but costs more per pound than sirloin steak.

——A famous make automobile which is allegedly much quieter than a far more expensive auto. Unfortunately, the far more expensive model used in the test was the 1931 model of this reputable car.

——"100% pure" orange juice which is laced with water.

——The fact that 87% of all meat sold in New York City is underweight (according to Bess Myerson Grant's Consumer Protection Office).

Ross pointed out that a squad of "full time, vigilant observers" is needed to combat this problem. This, he said, is where WMPIRG comes into the picture. In order to get a staff of people who know how to combat these injustices, he maintained, the organization must be able to show them reasonable financial security so that they'll know where their paychecks are coming from.

Ross explained that this is why the circulating petitions is necessary. With the authorization of 50% of the students, a two dollar per semester fee will be charged to the student body for support of WMPIRG. This fee, he added, is fully refundable to students who do not wish to support the group.

A UMass student who is active in the petitioning drive told the Collegian that at present the petitioners have garnered approximately 6,000 signatures. They need, he said, 9,000 signatures in order to get the needed 50% support but the WMPIRG organization would like to get 12,000 by the time they are through. The student volunteers of the WMPIRG organization along with Mr. Ross ask the students here at UMass for their continued support until the needed number of signatures is obtained.

Students Lobby For Ed. Funds

The National Student Lobby has announced a major lobbying effort on The Higher Education Act--S. 659. This lobbying activity will involve hundreds of students across the country and will be directed at Congress to insure full-funding for student assistance programs.

Congressman Albert Quie of Minnesota recently called S.659, "The broadest Higher Education measure ever to be considered by the Congress." This bill deals with the relationship between students and the Federal government--that means money and loans for the majority of 8.6 million students on 2,573 campuses across the nation. These Federal programs include money for NDEA, E.O.G. programs, Work-Study and Federally insured loans.

Layton Olson, the Executive Director of the NSL said, "The National Student Lobby is calling upon students to come to Washington on March 22, 23 and 24 to talk to their representatives about this important bill. The funds for student assistance programs will be substantially cut again this year unless students take an active role in Congress--that means lobbying."

The NSL Lobby Conference on the Higher Education Act will be held in Washington, D.C. at Georgetown University (and on Capitol Hill) March 22, 23 and 24. Besides spending two full days lobbying on Capitol Hill and speaking with Congressmen and Senators, a schedule of speakers has been arranged.

Jack Anderson, the Washington syndicated columnist, will address the students at a reception held on March 24. Mr. Anderson recently exposed the credibility gap of the Nixon administration by publishing the "Anderson Papers." Also, John Lagomarcino, the Director of Legislative Affairs for Common Cause, the citizen's lobby, will speak on the power and potential of lobbying.

Furthermore, representatives from the California, Colorado and Texas student lobbies will discuss their experiences with lobbying activity on the state level.

One week ago the NSL sent a mass mailing to all student governments in the United States inviting them to send delegations from their schools to speak with the representatives from their district. This literature outlined a number of important details:

* students will be coming as registered lobbyists with the NSL and the U.S. Congress.
* information on S. 659 will be sent to students who indicate a desire to come to Washington, D.C. (so that students are prepared for lobbying on the bill)
* weekly reports will be sent out to keep students informed about developments concerning the bill.

Layton Olson, the NSL Director also pointed out that, "The students who come to Washington will be lobbying for an additional $914 million in student aid over last year's appropriation. This will cover increased funding for all student assistance programs. In addition, students will come to Washington to press for specific programs for their schools-such as emergency aid to community colleges, financially struggling small colleges and ethnic heritage programs."

U.S. Nets Soviet Fishers

ANCHORAGE, (AP)-Three Soviet officers were fined a total of $80,000 Wednesday on charges of conducting illegal fisheries support activities in U.S. waters, and $170,000 more will be paid to satisfy a civil complaint against their two ships.

A plea of guilty was directed by a federal judge in the criminal charges against the three officers after they asked that their pleas be changed from innocent to no contest. They were fined a total of $80,000.

G. Kent Edward, U.S. attorney in Alaska, announced a $170,000 out-of-court settlement in the civil complaint against the two ships, the 362-foot processing vessel Lamut and trawler Kolyvan. The vessels, seized by the Coast Guard last month about nine miles from St. Matthew Island in the Boring Sea, are being held on Adak Island.

The fines are to be paid by the Soviet Embassy to the Justice Department in Washington, D.C., on Thursday.

Vladimir Artemov, Igor Bovtun and Nikolai Pavluk were charged Jan. 24 and entered pleas Jan. 28. Artemov is master of an 80-vessel herring fleet operating in the Boring Sea. Bovtun and Pavluk are skippers of the two vessels seized.

Warrant Out On Malik Hakim

BOSTON (AP)-Massachusetts State Police issued a nationwide alert Wednesday night for the arrest of Roxbury community worker, Malik Hakim, on a fugitive from justice warrant.

State Police, accompanied by Boston Police, went to the Malcolm X Community Center in the Roxbury section at 10 p.m. where they were told Hakim could be found.

The alert was issued when no trace of Hakim was found.

Earlier Wednesday, Gov. Francis W. Sargent signed the second set of rendition papers seeking the return of Hakim to Missouri.

Massachusetts Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn completed his inspection of the extradition papers, delivered to the governor's office Friday, and returned them to Sargent.

In a letter to Missouri Governor Warren E. Hearnes, Sargent said: "I have today complied with the request of the State of Missouri and signed rendition papers for Albert Bradford, who is known here as Malik Hakim.

"I signed these papers today because the charges against this man are too serious for me to do otherwise; the State of Missouri has the right and the responsibility to its citizens to prosecute the case it has prepared against Albert , and further the accused deserves his day in court, his chance to refute the charges leveled against him."

Hakim is wanted by Missouri authorities under his legal name of Albert Bradford for violation of parole and to face charges of rape, robbery and attempted murder.

He was arrested in Boston, May 17 last year and Missouri immediately requested his extradition. But Hakim subsequently was released by Suffolk Superior Court because of a technicality involving identification in the papers sent by Missouri.

Massachusetts officials said Wednesday the same courtroom procedures involving identification would have to be gone through again as a result of the second extradition attempt.

Manchester Bombings Linked To Primary

MANCHESTER, N.H. (AP)-The bombing of police and fire headquarters here Wednesday has been linked by the state attorney general to plans to blow up the New Hampshire primary headquarters of President Nixon.

A man and a woman were arrested and charged in the bombings shortly after the three blasts occurred. Atty. Gen. Warren Rudman said that when the two were taken into custody a news release concerning the bombings also was obtained.

The release said that besides the police station, the Nixon headquarters also had been a target. No bomb was found at the headquarters, where 12 antiwar demonstrators were arrested Saturday during a talk by George Romney, secretary of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

A fourth bomb was discovered by a janitor on the outside window ledge of Police Chief John Stips' office. Demolition experts said the bomb didn't explode because of faulty wiring.

No policemen or firemen were injured when three bombs shattered windows at the police station and the nearby new fire headquarters. Authorities said the bombs had been placed outside the buildings.

Rudman said the news release linked the bombings to a group called "The People's Liberation Army." Referring to the anti-Nixon demonstration, the typewritten statement said "the pigs viciously attacked them" and that "while demonstrations like this are necessary, we are not going to get far, always fighting on the pigs' terms."

Valerie Hawkins of Dover, a spokesman for the group that demonstrated at the Nixon headquarters, denied that this group had any connection with the bombings. "Our purposes were peaceful. We were demonstrating against Nixon, not against the Manchester police," she said.

Arrested were Jaan Karl Laaman, 23, Buffalo, N.Y., also listed as Karl A. Laaman, and Kathryn A. Holt, 21, with addresses in Boston, Buffalo, N.Y., and Portsmouth and Dover, N.H.

Laaman was charged with two counts of damage to a public building and with unlawful transportation of explosvies. Miss Holt was charged as an accessory in damage to public building and with unlawful transportation of explosives. Laaman was under guard at a hospital where he was taken with an injured hand shortly after the explosions and Miss Holt was being held at the city jail. Laaman's bond was set at $30,000 and the woman's at $25,000, with probable cause hearings set for Feb. 25 for each.

Nationalist Revolutionary Government Set Up In Ecuador

QUITO, Ecuador (AP)-The commander of the army set up a "nationalist revolutionary government" Wednesday after banishing President Jose Maria Velasco Ibarra, an elected civilian who became a dictator nearly two years ago.

Gen. Guillermo Rodriguez Lara's bloodless coup made Ecuador the sixth South American nation to live under military rule. The addition of its 6.1 million people brings the number of South Americans ruled by military men to about 145 million, or 80 per cent of its 183 million population.

Northern Ireland Turmoil Continues

BELFAST (AP)-Terrorists dragged a bus driver away from his screaming passengers Wednesday night in Londonderry and executed him the getaway car. A British soldier was slain near Belfast, bringing Ulster's death toll in 2-1/2 years of violence to at least 245.

In Newry, Bernadette Devlin and 25 other Roman Catholics won a court victory by gaining postponement of a hearing on charges that they participated in illegal marches. Placard-carrying crowds cheered the decision.

McCloskey Charges Nixon Deceitful

LITTLETON, N.H. (AP)-Rep. Paul N. McCloskey, R-Calif., carried his presidential campaign into New Hampshire's mountain country Wednesday, attacking what he called the Nixon administration's "pattern of deception."

"When lying becomes a pattern of government...in my judgment you have to replace the government to restore the people's faith in it."

NEW YORK (AP)-Mrs. Clifford Irving was arrested as a fugitive from Swiss justice Wednesday and released on $250,000 personal recognizance bond in the case of her husband's disputed Howard Hughes autobiography.

Nixon Does Homework; Leaves For China Today

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon, after doing 11th-hour homework at his secluded mountaintop retreat, departs Thursday on the first leg of his self-described "Jounrney for Peace" to China.

As Nixon prepared to fly back by helicopter after an overnight stay at Camp David in Maryland's Catoctin Mountains, an army of aides wrapped up final details for his historic 13-day, 20,395-mile trip-including plans for a star- spangled departure ceremony.

Congressional leaders and Cabinet officials are to join a thousand flag-waving school children who will be on the White House South Lawn to bid farewell to the President, Mrs. Nixon and the 13-member official party at 10 a.m. EST Thursday.

Nixon will make brief remarks at the ceremony which follows a White House meeting with bipartisan congressional leaders.

The presidential jet leaves Andrews Air Force Base, Md., at about 10:30 a.m. for a 10-hour nonstop flight to Hawaii, where Nixon will stay two nights readjusting to the time change before flying on to Guam for an overnight stop.

He will land at Shanghai-and become the first American president ever to touch Chinese soil-at 9 a.m. China time next Monday 8 p.m. EST Sunday.

After a Chinese navigator joins the crew of the "Spirit of '76," he will fly on to Peking where he will be officially welcomed by Chinese leaders at 11:30 a.m. China time 10:30 p.m. EST Sunday.

His week in three Chinese cities--Hangchow is the third--will be devoted to an open-ended series of talks with Communist leaders, a round of four banquets, and side trips to the Great Wall and other historic Chinese sites and shrines.

The President Wednesday sought the solitude of his Camp David retreat to finish reading loose-leaf volumes of classified material on China. Aides said he worked past midnight in Aspen Cottage, then was up and at his desk before 8 a.m.

He returned to Washington Wednesday afternoon.

Responding to newsmen's questions, deputy press secretary Gerald L. Warren said, "As is customary on state visits and official arrivals, we have invited schools in the metropolitan area to send children" to the event.

He described the trips as "an educational assist for teachers" and added, "we have done that for every state and official visit."

White House staffers and federal employees from other nearby government buildings also will crowd onto the White House lawn. Asked whether military honor guards would be present, Warren said, "I wouldn't be surprised."

N. Viets Claim 2 U.S. Planes Downed

BULLETIN

SAIGON (AP) — Waves of American figther-bombers are conducging extensive air strikes against new offensive, long-range artillery inside North Vietnamese territory and have destroyed five guns so far, the U.S. Command announced Thursday.

SAIGON (AP) — U.S. planes mounted a new series of strikes inside North Vietnamese territory Wednesday, American military sources said. Radio Hanoi claimed two planes were shot down, and a number of pilots were killed or captured.

The U.S. Command declined comment. The command nas a policy of revealing aircraft losses only after search and rescue operations for any downed pilots are completed. It says early disclosure might endanger chances for rescue.

If the Hanoi claims are substantiated, it would mark the first American aircraft and pilots reported lost over North Vietnam since the five days of heavy air raids last Dec. 26-30, when more than 1,000 strikes were flown and 12 planes were lost.

The U.S. informants and pilots gave only scant details of Wednesday's raids. They said most of the strikes were in North Vietnam's half of the demilitarized zone and that there may have been some further north.

The sources would not disclose the targets, but said some of the strikes were "protective reaction." This means pilots can attack enemy antiaircraft defenses considered a threat to U.S. reconnaissance planes flying over North Vietnam or planes bombing enemy supply lines anywhere in Indochina.

Radio Hanoi claimed that a number of jets attacked populous areas of North Vietnam's two southernmost provinces, Quang Binh and Vinh Linh.

The informants did not disclose the number of planes or strikes, except to say the raids were substantial.

Earlier, a senior U.S. military source noted that North Vietnam had moved surface-to-air missiles to near the DMZ where they could hit American planes.

Convicts Rebel In Pitt

PITTSBURGH, Pa. (AP) — Five Guards and six inmates were injured in a disturbance at the Allegheny County Jail, authorities said.

Sheriff Eugene Coon, who is responsible for the security of the 84-year-old institution in the city's downtown section, said the disturbance was triggered by inmate grievances over "meals, conditions and other things."

The guards were treated and released at a nearby hospital, officials said.

The injured inmates, meanwhile, were taken by cruiser-escorted police vans to Western State Penitentiary, on the city's northwest side, where authorities said they would be treated at the prison hospital. None appeared seriously hurt, Western State Warden Joseph Brierly said.

Coon said the disturbance erupted Tuesday while William Robinson, warden at the jail, was trying to discuss grievances with inmates in the jail's main courtyard.

"We talked for about 10 minutes," Robinson told newsmen later. "Then the argument became heated on their side and one of them hit me in the jaw."

A scuffle followed, Robinson said, with guards coming to his aid.

There was no immediate word as to the extent of the outbreak, but Coon said an investigation was underway. The sheriff added that the disturbance was brought under control within 20 to 25 minutes.

Police clear pickets from path of truck bringing coal to Midlands. The coal miner's strike has caused a showdown in industry, putting 3 million Britons out of jobs. (AP)

3 Million British Jobless

LONDON (AP)-The toll of jobless approached three million Wednesday because of the power crisis and Britons were told to expect even more hours without lights and heat.

But a bright spot appeared. An independent inquiry into the coal miners' strike that has forced electricity cuts came to an end and its members promised to recommend a pay settlement by Friday. If accepted by the government's Coal Board and the union, an end could come by the weekend to Britain's worst blackout since the blitz in World War II.

All hope of averting a total shutdown of Britain's coal-fueled electric power plants within the next two weeks rested on the success of the three-man inquiry headed by Lord Wilberforce, a former High Court judge.

His panel originally had been expected to take 15 days before suggesting a way out of the power crisis that threatens to close British industry and throw 20 million men out of work, by the end of the month.

But it finished its hearings after only two days, split evenly between the striking miners and the state-run Coal Board.

The government-named panel can recommend but not impose a settlement. The Coal Board, however, haspromised to accept whatever recommendations the inquiry makes for settling the strike, now in it sixth week. The miners have made no such pledge.

Nevertheless with the bite from nationwide electric power cuts getting worse each day, pressure was building up on both sides to reach an early settlement.

British industry, already down to a three-day work week because of the shortage of power supplies, laid off hundreds of thousands of additional workers.

Power cuts turning off heat and light in homes across the country sharply increased. In the morning between 5 and 10 per cent of the nation's power supply was withheld to conserve dwindling fuel stocks. By the afternoon the figure had risen to 15 per cent and authorities warned it could hit 20 per cent.

For individual homes this means power cuts of up to nine hours a day, with three-hour blackouts following three-hours of power supplies.

Food supplies were threatened as processing plants reported that further power cuts would cripple production.

Prime Minister Edward Heath's Conservative government, severely criticized by the opposition all week on charges of intervening too little and too late in the power crisis, faced a crucial test in Parliament.

Debate opened on the enabling legislation needed to bring Britain into the European Common Market. Rejection in the vote Thursday would force Heath's government to resign.

In past Common Market ballots Heath has been helped by a split in opposition ranks on the issue. The opposition is now united and angry, largely because of the government's handling of the power crisis.

Army Bulldozes Usable Equipment

PHU BAI, Vietnam (AP)-Bulldozers are busy making junk out of equipment the U.S. Army says is not worth keeping and too expensive to give away.

Here on a muddy hill the ebbing American military presence has left dunes of crushed desks, lockers, air-conditioners, refrigerators, bunks, steam tables and other paraphernalia of modern war-some 3,000 tons of metal alone.

Before the bulldozer strikes, much of the equipment is battered but usable. A small amount is new.

But most of the metal here-and at seven other Army property disposal facilities in Vietnam-will be sold for scrap at prices ranging from $4 a ton for light iron and steel to $100 a ton for aluminum.

It is easy to be shocked at the waste, but not so easy to advance a solution to this irony of wartime economics: the property disposal agency says the only items legally consigned to the scrap heap are those it would cost more to dispose of in any other way.

Most of the incoming equipment has been so judged, says Warren S. Everett, the agency's deputy director in Vietnam.

But much of it has served U.S. units until dumping time and could be put to use by the Vietnamese, who patch up anything from roofs to automobiles with an adeptness born of necessity.

Vietnamese interest in American castoffs is evidenced by occasional attempts to steal from the Phy Bai facility.

The disposal men are bound on one hand by red tape designed to prevent corruption and pressed on the other by a work load that has doubled in the last month and may double again before spring.

"There, they've done it to us again," sighed S. Sgt. Sylvanus Watts, pointing to three steel acetylene gas cylinders drumped near a heap of scrap aluminum.

"We've had them bring new motors in here, still in the crate, and I've turned them back. We can't accept these things, but there's only half a dozen of us. We haven't got the men to keep it all out."

While the yard crew is racing to keep up with sorting and paperwork, a steady stream of trucks spirits in more and more usable equipment.

The reason, disposal men say, is the accelerated withdrawal. U.S. military units are in haste to pack up and get out, and dumping equipment is easier than going through channels.

South African Pass Laws Streamlined

(LNS)

(LNS Editor's note: One of the most degrading elements of the South African system of apartheid is the pass laws. These laws require all Africans to carry and produce on demand a 96-page pass book which records jobs, tax payments, permission to be in a particular area, and other details. This system works as the main way of policing the apartheid laws, that restrict Africans, who make up 68% of the population, to 13% of the land unless they have proof of employment outside their "reserve".

After the miners have gone through the administrative procedures, they wait at a railroad station for transportation to the mine. The identity tag on the man's wrist shows shipment of labor to which he is assigned. (Photo by LNS)

In 1960, South African police opened fire with machine guns on a crowd peacefully protesting the pass laws at Sharpeville, killing 63. The American press was full of horrified accounts of the Sharpeville Massacre. But it made little mention of the fact that South Africa was bailed out of a severe economic crisis a few months later with the help of a mammoth loan from U.S. banks led by the Rockefeller-owned Chase Manhattan.

Now, over 10 years later, the pass laws are functioning with even greater efficiency, once again through the help of U.S. business. Polaroid and IBM have provided the technology to make the whole system operate so smoothly and efficiently.)

On December 30, 1971, the Polaroid Corporation announced its intention to keep distributing its products in South Africa. It declared its "anti-apartheid experiment" had "exceeded the expectations of many".

The "experiment" was the justification for continuing business in South Africa. It was launched only after black workers within the Polaroid Corporation's Cambridge headquarters instituted a boycott. The protest focused public attention on the fact that Polaroid had for 30 years been enjoying profitable business relationships in South Africa. These relationships included providing the racist white minority government of South Africa with the Polaroid instant ID2 system, used by the government to take pictures for the passbooks which all blacks are forced to carry.

The Polaroid Workers Revolutionary Movement demanded that Polaroid:

1. announce a policy of complete disengagement from South Africa.
2. announce its position on apartheid publicly in the U.S. and in South Africa.
3. contribute profits earned in South Africa to recognized African liberation movements.

In response, Polaroid launched a slick and costly public relations campaign. It sent four employees, two black and two white, on a ten day "fact-finding mission" to South Africa. Upon their return, Polaroid took out full page advertisements in every major paper in the country, declaring its "abhorrence" of apartheid, but its intention to try to "push the door on South Africa further open, (rather than) close it." The advertisements stated that Polaroid would not terminate its business activities in South Africa, but would undertake an "experiment" of one year's duration to: 1) "improve the wages of non-white workers", and to train them for "important jobs", and 2) financially support education betterment for blacks, to the tune of $75,000.

The ads announcing the "experiment" cost Polaroid at least $100,000. Now, one year later, it has reported back to the American public on the "success" of its venture.

The claim of "success" hardly stands up under careful scrutiny.

The Polaroid experiment called for a "dramatic" improvement in non-white wages by its local distributor in South Africa, and the initiation of a "well-defined program to train non-white employees for important jobs within the company."

Polaroid's first claim is that its local distributor, Frank and Hirsch, has "been engaged during the past year in a program of wage and benefit improvement for black employees."

While average African salaries have gone up, Frank and Hirsch's black employees still receive an average wage of R58 ($75) per month, well below the Johannesburg poverty line of R70 ($91). In addition, Frank and Hirsch continues to hire African clerks at the lowest possible salary allowed by the South African government (which is also below the Johannesburg poverty line).

Far more important is the fact that the difference between white and black salaries still remains enormous. Even top black wage earners in South Africa cannot hope to receive anything close to the average salary given to white wage earners.

But above and beyond the specifics, is the fact that, in South Africa, it is illegal to promote any significant wage or position improvement for African people. When Polaroid tried, in its first attempt to counter protest, to assert that its distributor in South Africa was an equal opportunity employer, a spokesman for Frank and Hirsch quickly replied: "I do not know where they could have obtained such a statement. We are governed by the laws of the country. Would they allow the existence of such a policy? It is impossible." (Johannesburg Star, November 21, 1970.)

In South Africa, it is against the law for any black man to occupy a position senior to any white man in the country. The Minister of Labour, Marais Viljoen, asserted vehemently during the height of the Polaroid crisis last year, that he would "act within hours" if a white worker anywhere in South Africa was placed under the authority of a non-white. The appointment by Frank and Hirsch of eight additional African "supervisors" is ludicrous tokenism at best, and the limits to this tokenism remain openly and sharply drawn by the racist white minority government of South Africa.

The other half of the Polaroid "experiment" has to do with contributing to the education of blacks--which Polaroid declared, last January to be the "key to change in South Africa". Toward this end, Polaroid boasts of having contributed $10,000 to the U.S.-South Africa Leadership Exchange Program, which brought two blacks, a librarian and a clinical psychologist, to the U.S. this year.

In addition, $15,000 was contributed to a "black-organized and operated institution", the Association for Educational and Cultural Advancement (ASSECA), and $50,000 to the American-South African Educational Trust (ASSET).

What Polaroid does not tell us, is that the Leadership Exchange Program might have added two token blacks, but that its board remains controlled by whites, and that the overwhelming majority of the people they choose to send to the U.S. are whites, many of whom are advocates of the racist policies of the South African government. Furthermore, Polaroid does not explain that ASSECA and ASSET are not institutions that may act autonomously since in South Africa, all black education is under the direct control of the government.

It is the law in South Africa that all African education must be education for servitude. The goverment's Bantu Education Act states explicitly that "Bantu (the black) must be guided to serve his own community. There is no place for him in the European community above the level of certain forms of labor."

Hendrik Verwoerd, former Prime Minister of South Africa, stated his intention in plainly understandable language: "I will reform it (the educational system for Africans) so that Natives will be taught from childhood to realize that equality with Europeans is not for them."

Any amount of money which Polaroid gives, be it $75,000 or $75 million, only serves to aid the South African government in more efficiently educating South African blacks for inferiority. Polaroid has systematically refused to acknowledge these facts.

The real "success", the real significance of the Polaroid "experiment" is its development of a new public relations facade. Behind the facade they continue their highly profitable operations in South Africa--along with some 300 other American corporations.

For instance, the whole passbook system is held together by a computer rented from IBM. Under the "Population Registration Act" passed in 1970, a central register is being compiled which will contain detailed information about every woman, man and child in South Africa. In March 1971, the South African government announced an IBM 360/50 computer was to be rented at a monthly cost of $43,978.73 to operate the system. Thus, all the information contained in the 96-page pass-books required for all blacks in South Africa will be at the fingertips of police and other authorities.

Like Polaroid, IBM likes to brag about its efforts at liberalization of South Africa. But even their statements of liberal principle admit that they estend "insofar as laws and local practices within the country permit." In South Africa neither permits much of anything.

Meanwhile IBM's other assets in South Africa are substantial and growing fast. Their wholly-owned South African subsidiary, (International Business Machines, (S.A. Pty.) showed such a favorable growth rate that IBM invested an additional $3.42 million in 1971, nearly doubling its investments to $8.4 million.

The prospects for profit look good. IBM's South African managing director estimates that what is now a market worth $50.4 million annually could potentially be worth as much as $500 million within a decade. That, of course, depends on a continuing boom for the white-run economy and a minimum of resistance from the black majority. By supplying their technological assistance to streamline the pass law system, Polaroid and IBM are doing their best to insure those conditions.

Family Suspects Illness From Code

PARIS (AP)-"Say hello to Paul and his family...and to start working on my new fiberglass vault...Love always, Jack."

This cryptic line in a letter from a North Vietnamese prisoner of war camp has convinced Ruth Bomar that her husband, Lt. Col. Jack W. Bomar, is dying of a kidney ailment.

Mrs. Bomar, who is from Mesa, Ariz., received the letter Jan. 11.

Bomar, who was an Air Force navigator based in Thailand, was shot down over North Vietnam Feb. 4, 1967.

He was aware he had a kidney ailment, and so was the Air Force. But he was permitted to fly on a one-year waiver. The ailment, called glomorulonephritis, did not require therapy at the time.

Mrs. Bomar told a reporter: "Back in 1969 I had a letter and my husband said...have Paul-Paul is his brother; he's in the fiberglass business and builds boats-he said Paul should build him a fiberglass rocking chair.

"At the time I didn't associate it with his kidneys. I thought maybe they didn't get any exercise. I figured that when he got home he would want a rocking chair...and wouldn't be able to do anything for awhile..."

Then a letter dated Dec. 13 came. "My health is fair, honey. Enjoy boys high school daze sic." The Bomars have children in high school. Mrs. Bomar thinks her husband was telling her he was in a daze-sick.

Then the letter said, "Tell Paul to cancel fiberglass rocking chair and build me a fiberglass wheel chair...Love and kisses, Jack."

The Jan. 11 letter said, "Ho hum, another year down the drain...Say hello to Paul and his family...and to start working on my new fiberglass vault."

Mrs. Bomar said since Jack's last letter she has contacted Red Cross and U.S. officials in Washington, U.S. officials in Paris, and has attempted without success to see North Vietnamese officials here. She said the Red Cross sent two messages to Hanoi, but got no response. The Red Cross offered to provide an artificial kidney machine and technicians to operate it, she said.

Faced with refusal of the North Vietnamese to see her, Mrs. Bomar decided to make public her worries about her 45-year-old husband.

The U.S. delegation to the Vietnam peace talks said Mrs. Bomar had attempted for six days to see the North Vietnamese delegation, but could not get an appointment. The U.S. delegation expressed "The belief that this additional example of North Vietnamese callousness toward prisoners of war and their families will not go unnoticed by the American public."

Attempts to reach the North Vietnamese delegation for comment failed.

T'ai Chai Lessons Offered

Master T.T. Liang will be offering ten lessons in the art of T'ai Chi Chuan for $30 on Saturdays at 2 p.m. at Hampshire College's dance studio. Contact Demian at 253-5171 as soon as possible if interested in signing up.

T'ai Chi is ancient Chinese calithenics designed to center the mind and body. The value of T'ai Chi lies in the fact that it is a thoroughly balanced movement, works your internal organs as well as your external body, and lifts your entire system to an optimized peak efficiency, bodily as well as mentally. Its beauty is implied in its softness and profoundness.

The Chinese say that whoever practices T'ai Chi will gain the pliability of a child, the health of a lumberjack, and the peace of mind of a sage. T'ai Chi stresses slow respiration, digestion, the functioning of the internal organs and blood circulation.

Offshore Drilling Studied

BOSTON (AP)-The New England River Basins Commission Wednesday approved up to $25,000 for a study of the impact of offshore oil and gas drilling on the region's environment and economy.

R. Frank Gregg, chairman of the commission, said the proposed study would be a joint project with the New England Regional Commission and would be conducted by a private consultant.

The river basins commission recommended to the regional commission that Massachusetts Institute of Technology be hired to conduct the study, provided that MIT gets "recognized expertise in marine biology" to participate in, or review, the project, Gregg said.

The MIT study proposal, which would cost $105,000, would be funded with the $25,000 from the river basins commission, $27,000 already approved by the regional commission and some $50,000 from the Federal Sea Grant Program.

The river basins commission noted that the question of title to the oil and gas resources in portions of the Outer Continental Shelf off New England is before the Supreme Court, with both the federal government and the states claiming jurisdiction.

The commission emphasized that the proposed study would not be related to that dispute.

Gregg said Interior Secretary Rogers Morton had told him it would be "highly desirable" to conduct the study.

In other action, the basins commission decided not to change its boundries to include New York state lands that drain into Lake Champlain and the balance of Massachusetts and Vermont not already in commission territory.

The commission seemed ready to include the new areas when the Vermont representative at the hearing asked for further consideration of the consequences.

Forrest E. Orr, of the Vermont Agency of Environmental Planning, asked if the commission could provide services to the New York area in a reasonable time and if the commission could stay out of a Vermont-New York court controversy over pollution in Lake Champlain.

Gregg said because of financial and personnel limitations, the commission probably could not help New York in river basin planning until 1975 and might be accused of being ineffective in that area.

Gregg also pointed out that the commission is primarily a New England institution and its image might be affected if New York were included.

Commission members agreed that including New York would be inevitable but said that the decision should be delayed until the commission could provide full services to the state.

Final Steps

Since it will take two meetings of the entire faculty to ratify an amendment to their constitution calling for a restructuring of the Athletic Council, the Final Steps, we suggest that they schedule one of these before the Spring vacation. Currently, a full meeting isn't scheduled until after this break.

We all know how slow the process of reform can be, and we would not want the Faculty Senate accused of dragging their feet in this matter any further. Anything which will speed the process of allowing more student participation on the Athletic Council would surely be welcome.

Oh, Bye!

We would like to wish President Nixon a good trip to China today. And we hope that something fruitful will come of the trip, whatever that will be.

The Democrats said last night that they would not be upset if a solution to the Vietnam war came out of the China meetings. A Brookings Institute Fellow, "China expert", claimed that even if such a solution could be made, he doubts that Peking has enough political leverage to enforce such an agreement. White House officials have stated that that is not one of the goals.

One French "expert" has claimed that the Chinese will ask for massive economic aid from the United States. The Peking leaders supposedly feel that they cannot achieve industrial strength and raise the standard of living in their country without it.

Whatever happens politically, the Nixons should be getting a nice tour of a country which has not been seen by many U.S. citizens recently.

Actually, what we would like to ask is, "Do we want Nixon to return home?"

Slave Labor In Sapporo

Spain has won its first medal ever, a Gold in slalom. Japan, the host, swept the 90 meter jump. The United States pulled a silver in hockey, while the women's team saved our international jock prestige. Ard Schenk is a household word.

All we need now is an Olympiad featuring the best athletes on the planet. People like Bobby Orr, Jean Claude Killy, Karl Schranz, Patrick Russell, Peggy Fleming, Jim Thorpe. A competition in which the best athlete wins, not the most quietly financed athlete. For the present no one should hold his breath. Lord Brundage wouldn't have it.

Avery Brundage is an American millionaire fiercely devoted to amateurism. It is a harmless enough fetish, except when the fetishist is President of the IOC. Brundage's insistance on "amateurism" caused the disqualification of Karl Schranz from the recent Sapporo Games, and threatens the extinction of Alpine skiing in future Games. Alpine skiing being the principle attraction of the Winter Olympics, it is not hard to imagine their discontinuation after 1976.

Speaking practically, Brundage's attitude is disastrous for the future of the Olympic Games. But does he have ethics on his side? In your heart, do you know he's right? I think not.

Amateurism is an antedeluvian concept. In the earliest Olympic Games, the athletes were indeed amateurs. They were as amateur as one can be. They were Greek slaves. That amateurism began with slaves is appropriate to the present question. Amateurism can be defined in two ways. An amateur athlete is one who performs not for personal financial reward; rather he competes for "love of sport". He is interested in exercise or excellence, not in earning money for his ability and effort. An amateur is also cheap help. The sports' entrepreneur can sell tickets to an amateur event, and pay only expenses to the team. UCLA pays far lower salaries than its crosstown rivals, the Lakers, and gets much better results. NBC Television pays the IOC $36 million for television rights to the Games, and not a penny of this goes to the "amateurs" who compete. Management, in this case the IOC, owns the show, so the boss gets the money and the jocks get bronze medals plated with silver and gold.

In other words, Groucho wouldn't be eligible, and Karl wouldn't play.

Times have changed muchly since Mount Olympus was thought to be Headquarters. Zeus has retired, and Athene has gone to Hollywood. Slavery has been abolished. The time for Avery Brundage has likewise passed. The athlete who is paid for his skill is not a prostitute; the entrepreneur who earns a living by promoting amateur athletics is a thief.

Golf has allowed amateurs and professional to play together. Tennis, after years of "amateurs" earning more than pros (through under-the-table payments, another characteristic of amateurism), has allowed Open Play, although now there is a difference of agreement between Amateur management (the ILTA) and professional management (WCT) which threatens Open Tennis. Those who make a living by putting jocks in the main ring are hesitant to bring their practices up to date.

Athletes should seize control of their activities to prevent their exploitation. Like women, they should demand control of their bodies. Arnold Palmer threatening to start his own tour did more to reform golf in favor of the athlete than anything else has. Action speaks louder than passivity.

The Olympic Games should be open to the best athletes, whether they have been paid for their efforts or not. Then they will truly be a great showcase of sport. Shalom.

Dockworkers, Miners Strike

They have names. Like Billy, Ed, Mack, Donny. They wake up early and go down to the mines, many to work on their knees all day. The mine shafts are deep, some running for miles; the hot dry air is thick with coal dust. Few miners expect to pass an entire year without an accident. Early deaths from "black lung" are common. Many enter the mines at 15 or 16 years of age. They are compensated at rates ranging from $47 to $70 per week.

The British coal miners are on strike. The miners, characterized by British commentators as the most tightly knit and determined group in industry, are experiencing the privation and antagonism inherent in any long labor struggle. Even their meager wages are gone. They have had to fight police and scabs on the picket lines and on the docks. And now, much of Britain's coal using industry is slowing production or closing down. Electricity is in short supply. Layoffs in related industry are large and growing. Britain's capitalist government and press are attempting to isolate the miners and use public pressure to force them to capitulate. But the strikers are not alone.

The British working class is behind them. According to AP, "Three weeks ago, the miners launched a campaign of picketing power stations. Truck drivers in solidarity refused to cross the lines." Even those laid off in related industry stand with the miners. In the words of one miner, "They know that if we're defeated, it's a defeat for the whole union movement." It is precisely this class consciousness on the part of the British workers that gives strength and confidence to the miners, and which is central to their victory. As is apparent, the British ruling class, its state apparatus, and its media have closed ranks in a concerted effort to break the strike. The relationship of forces is recognized by the British workers, and they see the miners' fight as their fight.

One of the major overtones characterizing the strike has been the idea that coal mining is a dying industry. But according to the February 16 Boston Globe, "About 75% of British power is generated by coal,". The miners have been on strike for 38 days and AP calls it "Britain's worst industrial crisis in 46 years". Are these the markings of a dying industry? Or does Britain run on the sweat, blood, broken bones, and diseased lungs of thousands of men, whose families subsist on starvation wages?

On our own west coast we've been able to see the faint gimmer of a similar phenomenon. The greatest fear of the Pacific Maritime Assn. (ship owners), and the strongest weapon of the longshoremen - working class solidarity - reared its glorious head. Teamster truck drivers, stopped by picketing dock workers at the Mexican border, refused to cross the picket lines, thereby stopping the diversion of cargo to Mexican ports. The dock workers at Vancouver, in a display of international solidarity, closed down the port. These actions give an enormous boost to the strike by removing the ship owners' safety valves of Canada and Mexico. The impetus for these moves came from the rank and file, "other than from the leadership of the ILWU. The Strike Organization Committee, headed up by Harry Bridges (president of the ILWU), voted to leave non US ports open.

The long, systematic process of trying to obliterate all traces of working class consciousness in America has had its effect. It took a world war, built on the lies of patriotism and "preservation of democracy"; it took the wage concessions of the fifties and the imposition of a "respectable", conservative labor union bureaucracy; it took racism and sexism to divide the working class against itself and to reward the most backward prejudices. These are the pillars on which rests the image of a quiescent American working class.

The nature of a Harry Bridges becomes apparent to the striking workers when he opposes making the strike as effective as possible. Containerized cargo is one of the primary issues of the strike. It is a form of automation. Containerized cargo doesn't threaten Bridges' job. Under capitalism, such a technological innovation becomes a boon to the wealthy few, and a positive danger to the livelihood of dock workers. Richard Nixon felt that the dock strike was worthy of inclusion in his recent State of the Union message. He railed against the irresponsibility of labor, and made it known that the country would not stand for it. But Jimmy Hoffa, former president of the Teamsters Union whose workers are in solidarity with the longshoremen, just endorsed Nixon for re-election. Add to these instances the fact that top union "leadership" participates in the wage gouging federal pay board, and you can begin to see the cracks opening between American labor and its "leadership".

As soon-to-be members of the American working class, it is important that we learn the lessons of past and present labor struggles. It is necessary that we see our interests served through support and solidarity with thelabor movement, and not through petty divisiveness, abstentionism, or expedience. The gains to be realized from successful mine and dock strikes will go far beyond simple wage increases. They will demonstrate concretely the strength of an organized labor effort, with wide support, both direct and indirect, waged against a clearly recognized enemy. Victory to the miners. Victory to the longshoremen.

Letters To The Editor

Do You Need Life Insurance?

To the Editor:

I would like to respond to Ronald J. Nathan's article "Life Insurance Is Needed!" (Collegian, 2/14/72).

Mr. Nathan begins his sales pitch by labeling Consumer's Union (whose analysis of college students and life insurance he criticizes) as an "organization that earns its living by rating and ranking hairdryers...." He goes on to describe the reprint from Consumer's Reports as "an unjust attack," and suggests that the authors are unqualified to write about life insurance.

If there is an unjust attack here, it is Mr. Nathan's. Consumer's Union is a non-profit organization whose purposes, as stated in its charter, include "...to provide consumers with information and counsel on consumer goods and services...to give information and assistance on all matters relating to the expenditure of the family income...." It has been studying life insurance since 1937, which should certainly guarantee a high level of expertise. Furthermore, it has been working for us, the consumers, and not for large companies. Mr. Nathan, on the other hand, is the President of the Pioneer Valley Association of Life Underwriters. Although he, too, is undoubtedly an expert in the field, his livelihood depends on selling life insurance. If any opinions are suspect, surely they are his!

Make no mistake. I am not dismissing Mr. Nathan's arguments. Some of them make sense to me. Indeed, I would enjoy reading the information he offers. But neither should your readers ignore the warnings of the Consumer's Reports article. I strongly suggest that anyone contemplating life insurance obtain a copy of the Consumers Union Report on Life Insurance (available for $1.50 from C.U. Book Department; Consumers Union; Mount Vernon, New York, 12550). It is not an anti-insurance tirade, but a well written guide to truths and half-truths in the business. As a student, I have found it extremely useful. Without such a manual, one must rely solely on the advice of salesmen--perhaps accurate, but certainly not objective.

I am glad that Mr. Nathan had a chance to give his side of the story. Nevertheless, I hope no one takes his advice and automatically rejects the warning that life insurance may well be unnecessary to many students.

Police Control

To the Editor:

I read both the article covering the drug busts of five area individuals last Halloween and the letter to the editor concerning the busts in last Tuesday's Collegian.

The article by Kevin Kevit reported that Officer Montleon found Mr. Kosnicki in possession of what is assumed to be a small quantity of marijuana while the letter to the editor stated that it actually was two marijuana cigarettes which were taken from Mr. Kosnicki. The press has always been ready to grant the accused the benefit of the doubt as to one's guilt. It seems rather odd that those supposedly acting on the behalf of Mr. Kosnicki, those who drafted and edited the letter, were not inclined to assume his innocence.

The letter to the editor claims that the police stole $2000 from Mr. Miller, who was also busted at the time. Granted policemen are not paid very much for what they must put up with and a little extra cash can always be used by everyone but it would seem much easier and more profitable for the police to steal the entire $6000 and not have to make out a receipt for the money at all. Certainly $6000 would be distributed a lot farther around the station house than a mere $2000.

The point is that this case is being used, not to champion the rights of individuals wrongly accused but to justify the control of a supposedly abusive and corrupt police department.

It will take a lot more than the sensationalism of this case, the civil suits and the poorly veiled threats to work outside the system to prove to the discerning reader that there is actually any justification for further community control of either the Amherst Police Department of the Campus Police.

Whose interests do you think would be served by further controls over the police?

Women's Chance

To the Editor:

I am a foreign student at UMass and am, incidentally, a women's track and field coach in England. I was amazed, therefore, to read the letter from Phyllis Olrich in a recent edition of the Daily Collegian in which she complained of the lack of readily available training facilities for women athletes at the university. We have seen from their successes at the Winter Olympics at Sapporo, that American women not only have the potential but also the 'guts' to become world beaters. Why can't the powers that be make things a little easier for them along the way by giving them the same opportunities as the male athletes? Why should the girl who wishes to train with weights, for example, have to compete for their use with the entire UMass Football squad? It seems a small thing to ask for some reserved time for women to train or even to use the whirlpool baths and similar facilities without having to go through 'the hassle' of making especial arrangements and appointments.

Is it not time American sportswomen were given a break and the longstanding myth of their lack of feminity shattered? Girls have the right and the ability, just as do boys, to enjoy and excel in sports and athletics. Women's Intramurals have done much to alleviate the girls' position. Perhaps there need be only one more step to giving them equal recognition and opportunities with the men. After all these are the 1970's; prejudice and discrimination should be in the past. Can you use your influence to promote and foster the cause of women's athletics?

By DON SAINT—PIERRE

There are many who argue that America is presently sitting on top of an ivory tower, with its nose in the air, and not realizing that in the rest of the world progress is being made which will soon render us the loser. This can be realized in many areas, such as the current economic mess. We would be ignoring truth to say the U.S. still controls the world's economy.

Another more subtle, though just as significant, area is this country's wasteful preoccupation with pornography and its control through censorship. As this fragile tower of christian ethic crumbles elsewhere in the world, our "moral leaders" are tenaciously attempting to hold it together here.

The breakthrough to understanding the problem began in the mid-60's when Denmark, realizing its inability to enforce its censorship laws, withdrew all legal restrictions on pornography and, as one god-fearing American said, "opened its doors to Satan."

After the initial rush to acquire "obscene materials" the Danes realized the absurdity of their actions and the once flourishing market with side-by-side stag flick theaters and "full color" magazine stories soon began to disappear.

The Danish Conservative's predicted increase in sex related crimes never materialized. Indeed, recent surveys have shown the incidence of these crimes has decreased, the most recent figure being by almost 70%, and its still decreasing. The facts seem to indicate that a lack of access to pornography is the cause of these crimes, and that if those individuals who wish to occupy their time as sexual voyeurs are allowed to do so, their wants will be satisfied and will be never externalized in the form of violent crime.

Realizing the profundity of the "Danish Experiment" liberal members of the Nixon Administration(?) encouraged the formation of a committee to study the effects of pornography in this country. The committee's report was presented to the President last year and claimed that "pornography does not harm individuals" and that free access to it allows people a means of harmlessly venting their sexual fantasies. In short, repeal of the pornographic censorship laws would reduce sex oriented crimes.

This, of course, conflicted with the President's Mormon upbringing, and he immediately shelved the report. Plans are presently underway for the formation of a new committee, one which will produce a "more accurate picture of the problem". That is, a condemnation of pornography (in the true American way).

The most recent development in this area is the formation of Morality in Media of Massachusetts (MMM) which is headed by a Catholic priest in Boston. Proclaiming that the Burger Court will now show "a new direction" the group is going to "prevent American culture from plummeting to the depths of barbarism".

The direction nay be new, for we have been moving foreward, though slowly, in producing more rational methods of dealing with this cancerous growth in our Puritanical life-style.

MMM is continuing the Victorian attack on the effects and not solving the essential problem. Pornography is not good, it is a distortion produced by an inhibited sex drive, caused by a suppression of those desires. Pornography exists because it is inaccessable, and it will disappear, as it is doing in Denmark, when people are allowed to see its gross meaninglessness.

If the energy being expended to suppress pronography were channeled into more constructive areas, such as helping individuals convicted of sex crimes to understand and correct their problem, progress could be made. Surely the fact that individuals are arrested on these counts is proof that suppression is not the answer.

The present direction can only result in a continuation of the dilemma.

IT BOMBED--The giant dirigible, Hindenburg, crashes to the grond in flames in the 1937 disaster at Lakehurst, N.J., that left 37 people dead. Author Michael MacDonald Mooney claims in a new book, "The Hindenburg", that the fire was a result of sabotage by a crewman rather than an accident. (AP)

HE'S TRYING TO SAY SOMETHING...at Northern Illinois University, the student newspaper Northern Star ran this letter from "Jack Casey": - Once upon a time, God needed a rest, so he appointed a man to take his place. This man was told to pass judgment on his fellow man and to put it all in writing.

"When God returned from His vacation, this man told God he wasn't about to be replaced by God, or anyone else, as he felt equal to God!

"This is how editorial writers came about and they still think they're irreplaceable, even by God."

WHICH BRINGS US TO the Central Michigan campus, where the Academic Senate there has been reported in the student Life as having voted permission to the School of Education to screen teacher candidates, "in hopes of insuring that candidates possess good health, high moral character and pronounced teaching aptitudes and interests."

Which shows how much the job market is tightening.

AND AT BLOOMINGTON, the Indiana Daily Student found occasion to use comments of its staff that did not justify policy editorials. So they listed them according to "Commendatorials" or "Condemnatorials."

Seems straightforward enough, as well as clever.

STUDENTS' RIGHTS is the new thing of Editor Hamp Carruth of the Florida State Flambeau. He is forming a coalition of student editors around the state to "deal with common problems relating to student publications and student rights."

He adds that "...problems have existed...without any unified voice asking to be heard. As the editors of the student publications, we will be able to speak for students so they can be heard."

All the way up to the White House, p'raps?

REQUIRED CAMPUS HOUSING is the rule at S'eastern Louisiana Univ., according to the LSU Daily Reveille, which laments editorially that already "antiquated housing regulations in Hammond have regressed."

The Reveille charges that the requirement that unmarried undergrads must live on campus even at LSU results in part from "the lack of foresight in building too many dormitories for the needs

UMass beware!

COOP TO REPAIR WHEELS has been formed at Wisconsin, according to its Daily Cardinal. "The Consumer's Cooperative Garage" is its name, and its game is to keep costs down by helping customers to do their own work.

Primarily a service center, the CCG will also teach "basic mechanics and train people in the intelligent use and maintenance of their vehicles."

A noble mission, that. Nader take note!

PHYS ED ABOLISHED as a four-hour general education requirement at Northern Illinois is the triumphant report of the Northern Star of recent days.

Effective this Spring semester, the dropping of PE may be substituted with other academic courses.

Marks New President Of Associate Alumni

Paul D. Marks of Framingham has taken office as president of the Associate Alumni of the University, the Alumni Board of Directors has announced.

He heads a slate that includes the following: first vice-president, Harold Fienman of Brookline, Class of 1950; second vice-president, Lois T. Toko of Needham, Class of 1956; treasurer, Robert Fitzpatrick of Amherst, Class of 1943; and secretary, Mrs. Lillian Davis of Worcester, Class of 1951. Three regional vice-presidents are Anthony G. Chambers of Bloomfield, Conn., Class of 1954; Stanley P. Chiz of Longmeadow, Class of 1950; and William C. Less of Newton Center, Class of 1951.

PAUL D. MARKS--New President of the Associate Alumni of UMass.

Marks is president of Display Craft Corp., designers and manufacturers of store displays and signs. The company has plants in Framingham, Holliston and Manchester, Conn.

He is a 1957 UMass graduate, and chairman of the University Chancellors Club. Marks is also vice-president of the UMass Building Authority and an exofficio member of the University of Massachusetts Foundation.

He is a town meeting member in Framingham and a member of the South Middlesex Community Center Board of Directors. Marks is married to Elaine S. Marks. UMass Class of 1956, and is the father of two daughters, 10 and 12 years old.

The Associate Alumni represents the over 36,700 alumni of the University of Massachusetts. Marks succeeds Dr. Stanley Barron of Sudbury, Class of 1951.

Defendant Tossed Out

BOSTON (AP) — William Gilday, on trial for allegedly murdering a Boston policeman, was ordered removed from the courtroom Wednesday by Chief Justice Walter H. McLaughlin of Suffolk Superior Court.

McLaughlin ordered the removal when Gilday persisted in efforts to address the jury, saying the jurors were prejudiced against him.

He was transferred from the eight-floor courtoom to a cell on the seventh floor, equipped with closed-circuit television to allow him to follow the courtroom proceedings.

McLaughlin later informed Gilday's lawyer that the defendant would be permitted to return to the courtroom any time he felt he could do so quietly.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Taurus, at times, prefers seclusion. These natives can be determined to the point of stubbornness. They have an appreciation of material goods, but are tenacious when it comes to holding onto principles. Temperament is no stranger to Taurus, but neither is creative ability. These persons, when they achieve success, usually do so in the face of obstacles. Some famous Taureans include Barbra Streisand, Joe Louis and Glenn Ford.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Partnerships, special relationships may be put to test. Many preconceived notions are overturned. You advance through daring, originality, ability to be versatile. Move with times. Welcome progress.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Some restrictions ultimately work for your benefit. Don't force issues. Steady pace gets you where you're going. Check facts, figures. Machines now can go haywire. Intelligent inquiry can save you money.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Some friends now exhibit tendency to talk too much. Be sure you get your own point across. Ignore one who tells tales out of school. Special message is highlighted. Be analytical. Take nothing forgranted.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Situation at home requires attention. Domestic area is accented. Make concession to family member. You gain through diplomacy. You lose it unreasonable. Don't permit pride to block progress. You will understand.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Hold off on travel decisions. You require additional information. Long-range plans are subject to change. Pisces is involved. See in light of reality. Don't become victim of wishful thinking. Relatives disagree.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You gain insight into financial transaction. You get chance for advancement. But try to delay money arrangement. You do better now by reviewing, utilizing past experience. Don't jump at first offer.

Girl Gymnasts Face Canadians Saturday In International Meet

By STEVE CARY

This Saturday, at 7 p.m. in the Cage, the Women's Varsity Gymnastics Team in a tri-meet arranged by Mrs. Kitty Kjeldsen, the Administrative Coach of the Woman's Team, will host the Vaundreni Silhouettes of Montreal, Canada, and Clarion College of Pennsylvania. The Silhouettes, who have contributed performers to the National Team of Canada, will be making their fourth trip to UMass in a meet that always provides the area with the finest in women's gymnastics. Clarion will be making its first trip to the University.

The undefeated Massachusetts team, headed by Co-captains Margie Combs of Colorado and Betsy East of Virginia, is determined to remain unbeaten and is highly regarded in the Eastern Regionals and annually competes in the National Championship Meet. Miss Combs, a Sophomore English major, leads in the all-around, an olympic event consisting of Floor Exercise to music, Side Horse Vaulting, Balance Beam and Uneven Parallel Bars, and is joined by Junior Marina Rodriguez of New Jersey, and formerly Cuba, and Freshmen Jeanine Berger of Pennsylvania, Gail Hannan of Delaware and Thanne Poth of Guatemala. Miss East, a Sophomore pre-med major, specializes in Vaulting and Uneven Bars while Ann Vexler of New Jersey, also a Sophomore and a National place holder in Floor Exercise rounds out the UMass team.

The Silhouettes, led by exciting Lise Oullette are younger girls, those fifteen years old being Senior members of the team. They defeated Massachusetts for the first time last year and never fail to please the crowd with their daring but graceful routines. Clarion has recently sent two of its members to the Pan Am Games tryouts. These girls are dedicated to the discipline and perfection of gymnastics as are the UMass girls, and the meet should be an extremely close contest well worth watching.

Seaver Signs For Bunch

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP)-Tom Seaver became the highest paid player in New York baseball history Wednesday when he signed with the Mets for a reported $120,000.

When the 27-year-old righthanded pitching ace reached agreement with General Manager Bob Scheffing, he became the youngest major leaguer to reach the $100,000 plateau.

Scheffing also announced the signing of right-handed pitcher Gary Gentry. Gentry, 12-11 in 1971, reportedly got $40,000.

"I didn't sign for the figure I actually wanted," Seaver said following a fifth and final meeting with Scheffing. "You never do."

But, added Seaver, "I would be 100 per cent happy if I had signed for $5,000 more."

He was named Rookie of the Year in the National League in 1967 after posting a 16-13 record. After a 16-12 year in 1968, he recorded a 25-7 mark in 1969 as the Mets won the pennant and went on to upset the Baltimore Orioles in the World Series.

In 1969, he was named the Cy Young Award winner as the best pitcher in the National League and also was voted the Hickok Professional Athlete of the Year.

After signing and before joining the other Mets pitchers and catchers in a workout, Seaver telephoned his wife Nancy, who also is in St. Petersburg.

Asked what her reaction was to his making more than Willie Mays did in New York or Babe Ruth, Joe DiMaggio or Mickey Mantle, Seaver replied:

"She said, 'Don't forget to bring some paper towels home.'"

Csonka Upset By "Super-Jock" Nixon

New York, February 14--"President Nixon may identify with football players, but I don't identify with him, and I haven't met a player yet who does," Miami Dolphins' running back Larry Csonka asserted today in an article in the current issue of SPORT magazine.

"The man upsets me with his role as a super jock," Csonka says of the President. "Here he is, the one man in the world who has, at his fingertips, all the information and the influence to make a lot of peoples' lives better. But what's he doing calling football players on the telephone and giving pep talks to teams?

"He isn't going to help anybody. It just brainwashes people more, makes people think football is a lot more important to them than it really is.

"He's either hung up on the violence, or else he's pulling off a master con job on a lot of sports fans. He's implying that he's one of them and he's hoping to get their votes in return."

Csonka, who visited with American servicemen in Vietnam in January 1971, says in the SPORT article that he's changed his mind about the war: "I used to think that what we were doing in Vietnam is right, giving the people over there Democracy, and all that. Now I think it was all a tragic mistake and the Vietnamese don't really give a damn if we're over there or not."

The Miami star said he felt guilty about being an athlete who had escaped the war when he was among the men who were fighting for real.

Girl Hoopsters Lose

The UMass varsity girls' basketball team blew a good chance to capture their first game of the season as they were overrun by a mediocre Keene State squad at Keene, 44-31. This loss drops their record to 0-6, with only 5 games left in the season.

As has been the pattern all season, the first half was close and quick with both teams enjoying hot streaks. But by halftime Keense sat on and 11 point lead, 29-18, insurmountable by no means. The consistent scores by Beth Fay and the playmaking leadership of Vicki Pagel held UMass's offense together for the most part.

The last two periods lagged considerably as the pace slowed and play became sloppy for both teams. UMass was barely outscored in this last half, 15-13, as their steam of the previous periods disappeared completely. The final buzzer ended a somewhat lackluster game, 44-31, and left Coach Farr to venture "What's wrong?" Very good question.

Beth Fay's 12 points was high for UMass, followed by Vicki Pagel with 5 and Jeanne Abrahamson's 3. Pat Bash, Chris Eugin, Marilyn Ritz and Pat Flispen each hit for 2 points, and Chris Molonea rounded out the total with a 1 point contribution.

A possible broken nose may put Vicki Pagel out of action for a while which would be a blow to UMass when they try to re-group forces to face Springfield Thursday.

Skaters Nipped In OT

By TOM PLANT

The names Guy Smith, Gordie Clark, and John Gray will not soon be forgotten by most UMass hockey fans. This trio showed why they are practically the whole scoring force of the UNH hockey team, as they got together to score all four goals in the Wildcats' thrilling 4-3 overtime victory over the Redmen last night.

Daily Collegian SPORTS

The loss dulled a brilliant effort by the Redmen, and a spectacular performance by goalie P.J. Flaherty.

At 1:34 of the third period, the Redmen quickly jumped ahead, 3-2, on a pretty goal by Brian Sullivan. Sullivan dropped a pass to Pat Keenan at the blue line, and Keenan fired a perfect pass back to Sullivan who put the puck in the net.

UNH had an excellent opportunity to tie it again and when the Smith, Clark, and Gray line dazzled the Redmen defense with some fine passing, but passed once too often. John Gray had the puck in front of an open side of the net, but, amazingly, chose to pass again and sacrifice a sure goal.

But, at 12:25 of the period, they made no mistake about it, as Gray took a drop pass from Clark and fired a perfect shot past Flaherty. This tied the game at 3-3.

A minute later, UNH had a two man advantage for almost two minutes, but couldn't put the puck past Flaherty. During this power play New Hampshire used their five best forwards, including their "terrific trio."

With only 34 seconds remaining in regulation time, the Redmen drew a crucial holding penalty, giving UNH the power play advantage for the rest of the period and into sudden death. This proved to be the killer as the UNH top scoring line went to work. Thirty-three seconds into the overtime period Guy Smith stole the puck in the UMass zone, and flipped it to Clark who had all the time in the world to put it by a helpless P.J. Flaherty.

Wildcat captain Dick Umile saw very limited action due to a shoulder injury. He and John Gray, incidentally, have recently been drafted by the New England Whalers of the World Hockey Association. UNH now has an overall record of 15-7. Their only loss to a Division II team came against Vermont, which isn't

Gray, along with linemates Guy Smith and Gordie Clarke, had a hand in the scoring of all four UNH goals. This one didn't quite make it. (MDC photo by Pete Manera)

Pat Keenan scooped two ten minute misconduct penalties in the game, to go along with his two assistants. He assisted on goals by Al Nickerson and Brian Sullivan. Mike Waldron scored the other Redman goal with assists from Jim Coleman and Charley Donovan.

An interesting melee occurred at the buzzer signaling the end of the second period. Riley of UMass took the Wildcats' Smith into the boards. Smith retaliated and started the scuffle. Four players joined in the pushing and shoving and high sticking penalites were incurred by both Riley and Smith. These penalties were worked off in the third period.

The pucksters are home this Friday night and meet the Colby Mules at the usual time for face off.

The "Need Basis" A Case Of Bad Timing

By EARLE BARROLL

It was only a week ago last Sunday that the Boston Globe ran the three-inch story pertaining to the new "need basis" policy that the Presidents of the Yankee Conference had voted in favor of Oct. 18, 1971. Since that time this three-inch column has ballooned into a near-book of pros and cons and uncalled-for hardships for the men who will suffer with the consequences of the decision, the coaches and Athletic Directors themselves.

Now the question pops up as to why it was announced during the course of the heavy recruiting seasons for the two sports it will effect most, football and basketball. Granted this policy will not effect the scholarships for this year but it does sound a death note to any aspirations of progressive competitiveness that recruits are looking for today.

They will think twice, perhaps not even think at all, of coming to UMass with the notion that "regression is on the way." As Asst. Coach Ray Wilson, chief architect of the UMass basketball team has said, "We have many contacts with the best high school basketball players in the Boston area, but as soon as they hear of this, they may be thinking other places than UMass."

During half-time of Saturday's game at UConn, I had the opportunity to speak with the Athletic Director of that School, John Toner, who is one of the chief opponents of the "need" policy. He pointed out a very important aspect which has not been made public yet - "there is much unfinished business to determine with this need policy. Each school has until January to reply to the Presidents Council if they can have a need policy at their school for athletes."

And for this reason he said, "I'm very disappointed with this decision. It was a premature announcement and a very unnecessary one at this time. Personally, we should not regress to the need policy...we should make what we now have better by increasing the total and fixed amounts of aid to athletes."

On the bus ride back from UConn, a dejected coach Jack Leaman said that this has been a trying time for himself, mentally, with the basketball season in its present stage, the selection for the new Athletic Director still up in the air and now the need policy fogging up his recruiting program.

There are three more sets of coaches in the Yankee Conference feeling the same pressures the UMass coaches are experiencing. Toner described himself as "only one voice in the Conference." But it was perhaps Mrs. Sandra MacPherson, Coach "Mac's" wife, who came up with the best thought when I told her after the game what Toner said. "Maybe he should yell a little louder," she said.

For the sake of the Conference, much louder.

Bucks' Prexy Moves On

NEW YORK (AP) — Ray Patterson, who in three years turned the Milwaukee Bucks into champions of the National Basketball Association by winning a coin flip for Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and trading for Oscar Robertson, was named president of the Houston Rockets Wednesday.

Patterson, who held the same position with the Bucks, tendered his resignation, effective May 1, although he will conduct the April draft of college players for his new club.

At the press conference announcing his move from Milwaukee to Houston, Patterson put his stamp of approval on Coach Tex Winter, saying, "I have no reason to entertain thoughts of a new coach," and said he felt the Rockets "are where Milwaukee was three years ago."

Three years ago the Bucks were as young as the Rockets, who moved this season to Houston from San Diego. But Patterson won a coin flip with Phoenix for the No. 1 draft pick and the Bucks selected Jabbar, than a UCLA senior named Lew Alcinder.

Later, Robertson was brought in as a steadying factor, and the Big O and Jabbar led the Bucks to the NBA championship last season.

One of Patterson's last trades was with the Rockets, a deal in which the Bucks acquired Curtis Perry and a No. 1 draft choice for Greg Smith. Houston has been criticized for the transaction.

Patterson takes over a Houton club that has been having considerable difficulty, first because of the shift from San Diego and second because of head-to-head confrontations between Winter and his star, Elvin Hayes.

The club, which met the New York Knicks Wednesday night, currently is in fourth place in the Pacific Division. Under realignment plans, the Rockets are scheduled to move into the Midwest Division with Patterson's old club, the Bucks.

A Luncheon To Beat All

By EARLE BARROLL

On a day when meat was forbidden and churches were crowded it was ironic that so many hams turned out yesterday at the Newman Center for the weekly Varsity M Club luncheon.

Complete with the cameo appearance of channel 22 and the candidness of a basketball coach who went through a disasterous skid last week and said, "It's great to be here after a long winning streak", this was a luncheon to beat all luncheons...even an Ivy League luncheon.

If it wasn't for the fact that Jack Leaman was there (or maybe it was Jim Mulcahy) one would have sworn that channel 22 was in the wrong neighborhood ..but that's sports for you. You win a big one (112-89) and riches and fame are right around the corner.

After a few minutes of filming the hams, cameras and all exited and Leaman entered with two of his mainstays this season Tom McLaughlin and Al Skinner.

All three agreed on one thing: it's great to be home. Leaman said that games like Tuesday nights are very advantageously placed in the schedule, especially when road games this year have been anything but fruitful.

McLaughlin and Skinner called home, "the best place they've ever played basketball in."

"It generates you and makes you do things you couldn't normally do," McLaughlin said. "You kind of owe it to yourself to win at home. On the road you have no one to answer to, but if you lose at home you've got to face 5,000 people."

For Jack Leaman the nightmare of last week still lingers...and it's perhaps UConn which bothers him the most. "This is the first time in four years that UMass has lost at UConn," he said. "But I'll guarantee you we won't lose to them down there again.

"After that game we got together and dedicated ourselves to the last seven games of the season. During this bad stretch we played with more finesse and less enthusiasm and this was probably the biggest problem for us.

"This is why we went with the younger players against B.U. I was especially pleased with the job Charlie Peters did on Garvin, their big center."

Rhode Island is next on the schedule and according to Leaman, "If we didn't worry about them before, we're certainly worried about them now." He was referring to the Rams upset over Providence on Tuesday.

Leaman described URI along with Harvard as the two best sub .500 teams he's seen in New England. The Rams have indeed had a strange season. Just check the following out and it'll give you an idea of what type of season they've had:

Against Richmond last week, URI was eight points ahead with 25 seconds left and lost in regulation time...One game later at B.C. they were ahead by three with seven seconds to go and had a one and one, but again lost...And against Providence they were 12 up with 1:25 to play and Marvin Barnes had a shot at the buzzer to tie.

Strange? To say the least...but pretty normal for this weekly segment of the Varsity M Club winter luncheon series.

30,000 For Wilt

PHOENIX, Ariz. (AP) — Wilt Chamberlain of the Los Angeles Lakers scored his 30,000th career point Wednesday night on a goal tending call during the Lakers-Phoenix Suns National Basketball Association contest.

Chamberlain's milestone basket came with 2:09 to play in the third period giving him 16 points for the game and an even 30,000 in his career.

Chamberlain tipped a missed Laker shot, then the ball was hit by a Pheonix player and the call was made.

Fac Sen Looks To Unionization

By JIM DEMPSEY

An important special meeting of the Faculty-Senate met yesterday afternoon, to discuss a possible unionizing of the faculty here at UMass. Three guest speakers were invited to present their views on collective bargaining in higher education today. The speakers representing: the National Education Association (NEA), the American Federation of Teachers (AFT), and the American Association of University Professors (AAUP), spoke of the results of unionization at their universities, while also relating what they feel are the advantages of their particular organizations.

Senator Timothy Bornstein opened the meeting by describing collective bargaining as a new frontier for faculty members. He called it a new procedure for decision-making. He noted that, in a country where collective bargaining has been the national labor policy since the depression, only 25% of its public employees now belong to labor unions.

"Exclusive Recognition" and "Good Faith Bargaining" were cited as the two basic methods of negotiation The first allows one organization authorized by a majority vote to speak for all regarding wages, hours, and working relations. While the second involves top administrators and faculty meeting around a negotiation table.

The first speaker was Dr. Belle Zellar of the Colleges and University of New York, who predicted tremendous expansion of collective bargaining in education during the 70's. She spoke of the NEA as providing the fair, systematic machinery for affecting higher wages, better working conditions, sufficient funds for coping with bread-and-butter issues, increased promotional ranks and expanded pension and health benefits. The NEA's vice- president, president-elect cited the complaint category of their contract as the key to the solving of many problems. One of the most fruitful advantages of organized faculty unions, she has found, is the power of political pressure, which a staff gains through affiliation with a national organization. It also promotes a spirit of cooperation and unity while building morale.

Dr. Israel Kugler, representing the American Federation of Teachers, saw his organization as a means of escaping the bureaucratic jungle that controls our universities today. He pleaded for a restoration of balance in education, as we had during the middle ages when schools were controlled by the students and faculty.

When faculty members are fired they are entitled to know the reasons, Kugler said. It is a part of a teacher's civil rights Administrations have twisted these civil rights around to use them as a weapon of secrecy. We are on a road of deterioration when one assistant professor in one department is paid more than a full professor in another department. This gap must be bridged between faculty and students. Kugler emphasized the grievance procedure as being the key element in this effort. Like the NEA contract, it guarantees to some extent a stride towards

On January 16, the local McGovern supporters held a caucus in Northampton for the First Congressional District. This District represents 88 cities and towns in western Mass. Six Delegates and four Alternate Delegates were elected at the caucus for the McGovern slate. Student Senate President Lee Sandwen was one of those Alternates. Also on January 16, a Muskie caucus was held. Nominations were collected and one week later the Muskie Headquarters appointed Judy Gill, Chairman of USCC., as one of the District Delegates. The reasons for the differences in each caucus were because the system of Delegate selection was unprecedented.

After the 1968 election, McGovern called for new Delegate election rules. The bill which contained these rules was defeated by the Massachusetts Legislature. Despite this the Democratic Party decided to use them for their own Primary.

At the Primary elections on April 25, voters will choose their Presidential preference, 20 Delegates at Large who represent the State, and 10 District Delegates. A delegation needs 500 supporting votes to run. Each Presidential candidates, Lindsey, Muskie, and McGovern, has his own delegation, and there is also a separate uncommitted delegation. The McGovern rules state that each delegation must contain 40 per cent women Delegates, one Delegate from the under 30 age bracket, and one Delegate from each minority group constituting more than ten per cent of the population.

If either Gill or Sandwen get the necessary votes at the Primary, they will represent the youth vote from this area at the Democratic Convention. They have campaigned at many of the 14 area colleges. Ms. Gill has held coffee hours dedicated to discussing the Delegate Slate and Muskie. Sandwen however has set up, with the help of other McGovern supporters, a conference table at the Campus Center. Both hope that the UMass students, who have lived in this area for more than six months, will register to vote here. Sandwen added, "The ballot this year will be the longest and hardest to use." He expressed a hope that the inevitable confusion will not force the people to vote only for their Presidential preference.

Sandwen has said that, "McGovern is the best of the significant candidates, and he has been opposed to the war since 1963." However Gill maintains that, "Muskie is not a one issue candidate." She believes that a candidate's stand on all issues should be the most important concern of the voters."

equality in the decision-making process.

Reading from an AAUP contract manual, Kugler blatantly named discrimination complaints as one outstanding difference between the AFT and the AAUP. It seems that the AAUP makes no allowance for hearings regarding discrimination.

Spokesman for the AAUP was Professor George Horton of Rutgers University. He was called as a last-minute substitute, when their union's representative was unable to attend the meeting. Horton traced the development of the Rutgers association with unionism which led to the current administration- faculty - cooperation. He described it as an exciting, wonderful experience. Discussion of a whole range of problems around a negotiation table had produced a number of effective solutions. He said the University Senate was a very important and helpful ingredient in solving many of these problems.

The AAUP has found strikes, job actions and the like to be quite unproductive and generally unnecessary. They believe that when the administration is presented with a sound, rational case--they'll listen to you.

The floor was then opened up to all for questions. Regarding the yearly costs of each organization, for the individual: dues for the NEA are $10 a month; $84 per year for AFT (for full-time faculty); and $60 per year for the AAUP. This money is then divided among the federal, state and local levels.

To the question, do contracts generally have no-strike clauses, Kugler answering for the New York State System, said it was a standard element of their contract. They operate on the no contract, no work basis. Horton said that New Jersey public employees were not allowed to strike. His faculty, however, expresses little interest in strikes.

Concerning student involvement in personnel decisions, Zellar said her board had recently passed a resolution saying there must be evidence of systematic evaluation by the students before appointments could be made. Although the NEA contract allows for peer evaluation, it is silent on student evaluation. Although in favor of student evaluation, Kugler mentioned the varied student experience factor as a negative aspect. Incoming freshmen, he felt, could not be as reliable in evaluating faculty members, due to their inexperience. He admitted that it's a knotty problem. The AAUP makes no mention of student evaluation of faculty in its contract. But the Rutgers' student body do publish an annual booklet containing student evaluations of the faculty.

Beginning at 7:00 p.m., further discussions with each union representative, were scheduled for the Campus Center. The final decision for the UMass faculty of whether to "unionize" or not would appear to be many weeks away.

Salzman Offered Job

BOSTON (AP)-UMass Boston has announced an offer of a 3-1/2 year fulltime appointment to its faculty to Dr. Freda Salzman whose discharge as an associate professor of physics two years ago triggered protests.

Chancellor Francis Broderick said a decision on tenure "would be made by June 1974, thereby giving UMass Boston and Dr. Salzman an extended opportunity for a fresh look at one another prior to the crucial tenure determination.

There was no immediate indication whether Dr. Salzman would accept the proposal.

She lost her job in 1969 because her bushand held a tenured appointment in the same department.

Broderick said that when Dr. Salzman received a partime appointment in 1965, virtually every college and university in the country either banned or discouraged the employment of husband and wife in the same school.

New Parking Lot Needed

By MICHAEL PATTERSON

According to the parking office, by next September there will be a parking problem on campus unless something is done within a couple of months. A number of alternatives have been suggested to alleviate the problem.

William Lambert, the resident architect here, suggested building a new parking lot directly West of the physical plant behind the baseball field. The lot which would have a capacity of 5,000 cars will be open to all students, faculty, staff and visitors.

In order to generate money for this project it has been proposed that student parking fees be raised from one dollar to ten dollars.

Robert Ferriter, one of the parking coordinators, stated that with the additional money it might be possible to operate a shuttle system over sidewalks and closed roads on campus similar to the one in operation at Disneyland, in California.

The shuttle cars would be battery operated, cheaper to run than a bus and far more versatile than the public transportation now in use on campus.

Ferriter and his associates stated that they helped in the installing of such a system at the Gilbert and Barker Manufacturing Co. with cars programmed to stop at various places in their plant.

Mr. Ferriter is planning a trip to Disneyland in the near future to ascertain the costs of such a venture at UMass.

Nixon's China Trip Criticized

(AP) - Rep. Paul N. McCloskey, R—Calif., criticized President Nixon's China trip Thursday as a "gimmick" while another presidential hopeful, Democratic Sen. Vance Hartke, expressed concern about the trip's potential impact on U.S. imports and employment.

McCloskey said in a radio interview in Berlin, N.H., that the trip was "a gimmick to divert people's attention just before the election away from the problems at home," and he warned it may backfire.

"I think the Chinese are smarter than we are, and they are going to take advantage of this visit. They're going to drop Mr. Nixon's trousers neatly around his ankles and he may never even know it," said McCloskey, challenger to Nixon in the March 7 New Hampshire primary.

Hartke voiced his concern in a challenge to Sen. Edmund Muskie, D—Maine, to take a public stand on the possible repercussions of Nixon's trip, as pertains to U.S. employment.

"I have not gotten a peep out of Muskie on my plan to close the tax and tariff loopholes that are helping export American jobs to Taiwan and other low-wage countries," Hartke said in a statement released in Manchester, N.H.

"Now that the President is on the verge of opening the gate to a whole new flood of goods produced by Communist slave labor, I think Muskie has an obligation to the voters to take a stand on something meaningful to American wage earners," he said.

The senator did not address himself directly to Nixon, nor did he elaborate on what he thought the trip's impact might be.

In New Hampshire, Sen. George McGovern, D—S.D., discounted polls that show him trailing Muskie in the state, saying: "They don't measure the degree of commitment ... to a candidate."

"I'm willing to make a very substantial wager with anyone that we will do better than the polls are indicating," he said in a radio interview at Lebanon.

Jets Down Over N.Vietnam

SAIGON (AP)—The U.S. Command said Friday that three Air Force jets were shot down Wednesday and Thursday by surface-to-air missiles during heavy raids over North Vietnam. The six crewmen were listed as missing.

The command earlier had reported one Air Force F4 was downed Wednesday. It reported on Friday the two additional planes were lost Thursday.

The downing of the three were the heaviest U.S. air losses over North Vietnam since last December 26-30 when three planes were reported lost.

The losses of a second F4 and an F105 "Wild Weasel" had been withheld pending a search-and-rescue mission which proved unsuccessful, the command said.

At the same time, North Vietnam claimed its forces shot down seven U.S. aircraft and damaged many others, killing or capturing a number of pilots.

The command said all three supersonic jets were lost in an area less than 15 miles above the eastern portion of the demilitarized zone.

The two days of heavy raids ended Thursday. They were directed against Soviet-supplied long-range artillery and antiaircraft defenses inside North Vietnam.

The U.S. Command reported planes which flew about 150 strikes met intense fire and more than a dozen surface-to-air missiles, or SAMs.

Summer School Cutback Likely

By JAMES E. GOLD

Despite rumors to the contrary, UMass will definitely have "some form of summer school" this year, according to Robert L. Gluckstern, Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs. Emphasizing that no final decisions will be reached for several weeks, he stated in an MDC telephone interview yesterday however, that the scope of the program may be cut back.

According to Dean of Students William Field, Governor Sargents' first budget figures showed that there is not "enough money to do everything we would like," therefore, a cost study has begun. Cutting back on summer school is only one of the alternatives being considered, he said.

Prof. John Moore of the Psychology Department stated in an interview that he received word that there would be no money for teaching assistants and "to proceed" on the basis of no summer school".

When asked about this statement, Dean Field replied that it does look like money will be tight and that no promises of hiring are being made because availability of money is so uncertain.

John T. Conlon, Dean at the School of Business Administration stated that SBA is exploring all possible ways of adapting to a new summer program. For example if the summer school is completely eliminated, he said, seniors might be able to do independent study projects in order to graduate in August. He stated that they are committed to letting changes have a minimum impact on students.

Gluckstern stated that the whole problem is finding out how to reduce expenses in the face of tightening money. "We'll have to take a look at our obligations", he said. He would not rule out the possibility that summer school be held only for freshmen.

Other implications of cutting back summer school programs include a loss of revenue from fees and business in the Campus Center, according to Gerry Scanlon, Campus Center Director. He pointed out in an MDC interview that the Campus Center Fee which students pay during the year is prorated and paid by summer students, also. These fees he stated go towards the amortization of the building.

Explaining that only 800 of last summer's 4600 student population lived on campus last summer, Scanlon went on to say that business in the C.C. and Student Union restaurants would suffer from large losses in revenue if summer programs are dropped or reduced.

Income from the bookstore would also drop proportionately to any cutbacks in the summer school said Scanlon. When asked if any layoffs could occur, he stated that work problems could probably be solved merely by having employees take their vacations in the summer.

Coalition Seeks Pollution Awareness

The New England Coalition on Nuclear Pollution is an organization of people of diverse interests who are concerned about nuclear pollution. Just under a year old, the Coalition is growing in schools and towns in New England. Catalyzing its formation is the Vernon nuclear power plant at Vernon, Vt.—however, there is a more fundamental concern, too. New England, according to current A.E.C. and utility plans, will have the highest number and concentration of nuclear power plants of any region in the country. The siting and construction of many of these plants will begin within the next five to eight years, and therefore the Coalition feels it is important for the people of New England to rapidly become informed enough to decide whether or not these plans are in their best interest. It is their belief that everyone can learn and understand enough to reach a personal decision on this issue—"we are not all experts, but that does not mean the issue should be mystified to us and we be left out of the decision making process." They have scientists working with them, as well as a nuclear engineer and an environmentalist.

Currently the Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Corp. is seeking an operating license for its Vernon, Vermont reactor, which they claim is ready to operate. Public hearings are going on, at intervals, in Brattleboro, Vermont. The Coalition is an intervenor in these hearings because they feel there are many unanswered questions pertaining to the operation of the plant that should be aired and looked into BEFORE the plant is allowed to operate. The position of the Coalition is not for or against the plant. They want to make sure the plant is safe.

Because this is a Coalition of New Englanders they solicit citizen participation and interest. "We urge you to inform yourselves and we are glad to help. If you support our questioning attitude, please help with our effort. With a little help from many people, we can do a lot -- we've come a long way in stimulating public interest but we still have a ways to go at arriving at a rational energy policy for New England." Those interested can get further information and literature at the C.E.Q. office in the Campus Center.

Busing Protest Jams Highways

WASHINGTON (AP) — Congressmen were buttonholed and highways were jammed Thursday as thousands of Virginians took a colorful, orderly and smooth school busing protest to the federal government.

Henrice County, Va., police said 3,261 cars carrying an average of four Richmond-area residents each traveled the four-hour round trip through falling snow to Washington for a half-hour drive through the city.

Signs saying "Save Our Freedom" picturing a traditional little red school adorned the vehicles.

At the same time, approximately 120 residents of the city of Richmond and Henrice and Chesterfield Counties, Va., broke into groups of four and visited offices of over 300 members of the House of Representatives.

They sought support for congressional efforts to outlaw busing as a means of achieving racial balance in public schools.

They specifically protested the Jan. 10 decision of U.S. District Judge Robert R. Merhige Jr. consolidating the mostly black Richmond schools with the overwhelmingly white Henrice and Chesterfield County schools.

"The decision disregards completely the sovereign governmental life of the counties," said Bob Isner of Henrice County.

One of their immediate goals was to win new support for a discharge petition that would extract from the House Judiciary Committee a proposed constitutional amendment banning busing to achieve a racial balance.

Only two additional House members signed the petition Thursday, bringing the total to 145. It takes a simple majority of 218 for the petition to take effect.

The anti-busing lobbyists said they found overwhelming support for their position. But, they reported, many congressmen are balking at the discharge petition route.

Jackie's Trial, Just A Laugh

NEW YORK (AP)-Jacqueline Onassis testified Thursday that she was not aware that she is a public figure nor that the people of the world wanted to read and see pictures of her comings and goings.

A packed courtroom erupted in laughter and Mrs. Onassis grinned back.

Mrs. Onassis, widow of the late President John F. Kennedy, was testifying in a complex-case of suits and countersuits being tried together, without jury, by a federal judge.

She seeks an injunction against free-lance photographer Ronald E. Gallella, charging that he has harassed her and her two children.

State To Appeal Belchertown Decision

The state is planning to appeal a decision by a federal judge in Boston ordering an evaluation of conditions at Belchertown State School and barring admissions and transfers from the institution.

Sources in Boston said the decision to appeal, which may be announced formally today, was reached at a meeting Wednesday attended by Asst. Attys. Gen. Hugh B. O'Malley and Walther H. Mayo, 3d, Deputy Mental Health Commissioner Wilifred H. Bloomberg, and representatives of Peter C. Goldmark, state human services secretary.

The Department of Mental Health is planning to appeal the decision to the U.S. Court of Appeals, according to the Boston sources.

Ernest M. Haddad, top legal aid to Human Services Secretary Peter C. Goldmark, said any decision on an appeal would be made by Atty. Gen. Robert H Quinn.

Last Friday, Judge Francis J. W. Ford issued a temporary injunction in U.S. District Court, Boston against the commonwealth in the suit brought by 28 parents of retarded residents of Belchertown.

The Boston sources said the appeal is to be based on the grounds that Judge Ford "abused his discretion in allowing the preliminary orders" mandating reform at Belchertown.

Mental Health Commissioner Milton Greenblatt reportedly left for a two-week vacation early Friday, the day of the decision.

Bloomberg, who is in charge of the department in Greenblatt's absence, reportedly said one part of Judge Ford's order - giving physical examinations to all residents within 30 days - would not be carried out without additional instruction from the court.

In Springfield yesterday, Belchertown Supt. Roland Nagle said none of the court orders was being carried out at Belchertown. He said he had been ordered not to comment on the suit, and was awaiting instructions from Boston on the court order. He said he has not received a copy of the order.

Boston sources said most of the persons at yesterday's meeting were in favor of appealing Judge Ford's decision.

If an appeal is filed, legal authorities said it would receive a hearing "probably within 24 hours" after filing.

If Judge Ford is reversed, the parents would have only one avenue of appeal open, the U.S Supreme Court.

B.U. Dean Says Legalize Grass

BOSTON (AP)-Dean Stephen J. Trachtenberg of Boston University has proposed that marijuana be legalized in order to raise money for subsidizing college tuition costs.

He told a symposium on drugs Wednesday at BU Medical Center that he thinks marijuana should be regulated at least as closely as alcohol and tobacco.

Trachtenberg said legalization would save the cost of trying to police illegal traffic, a task which he said was impossible because of widespread use of marijuana. He contended indications are that use of marijuana is increasing, and there appears to be a trend of public opinion toward legalization.

Dr. Herbert L. Posin, Boston University psychiatrist, disagreed with Trachgenberg on legalization. He said before he could support such a move, he would need to know the costs of legalization.

Nixon Begins "Journey For Peace"

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon began his "journey for peace" to China Thursday--a historic mission he said he was undertaking for all mankind in search of a common ground with the long-hostile and isolated Asian Communist power.

As he embarked for the first face-to-face summit meeting ever between U.S. and Chinese Communist leaders, he tempered his words of hope with words of caution.

"We are...under no illusion that 20 years of hostility...will be swept away by one week of talks," Nixon told some 8,000 persons attending farewell ceremonies at the White House. Then he and Mrs. Nixon winged westward to Hawaii on the first leg of his 20,395-mile, 13-day journey.

"We will have great differences in the future," he said. "What we must do is find a way to see that we can have our differences without being enemies at war."

From the White House, where school children, Cabinet officers, congressional leaders, government employees and tourists bade him farewell from the winter-faded South Lawn, Nixon flew by helicopter to nearby Andrews Force Base, Md.

There he boarded his blue, silver and white presidential jet, "The Spirit of '76," for the 10-hour nonstop flight to Kaneohe Marine Corps Air Station on the northern shore of Oahu.

His departure, which came as light snow fell from slate-gray skies, was televised live nationwide--a prelude to the extensive live television coverage planned for his eight days in China.

After a 45-hour stay in Hawaii, recommended by his physician to readjust to time zone changes, the President flies to Guam on Saturday for an overnight stop.

With his wife and an official party of 13 White House and State Department advisers, Nixon will arrive in Peking on Monday-Sunday night U.S. time-and become the first American president ever to set foot on Chinese soil.

Before returning to the United States Feb. 28, he will have an open-ended series of talks with Chinese leaders Mao Tse-tung and Chou En-lai, attend a round of four banquets in three cities and visit the Great Wall and other Chinese shrines and historic sites.

Nixon met for 45 minutes Thursday with Democratic and Republican congressional leaders, giving them what House GOP Leader Gerald R. Ford of Michigan described as "a realistic appraisal of the possible results." He promised to brief them upon his return.

Then, without a topcoat to ward off the winter chill, the President stepped onto the South Lawn to deliver his brief farewell remarks.

The President recalled his statement of July 15-when he announced that a secret summer mission to Peking by his foreign affairs adviser, Henry Kissinger, had set up the unprecedented summit meeting.

"That statement was, as you will recall, that this would be a journey for peace," he said.

Nixon noted, too, a toast offered by Chou when Kissinger was in China.

"'The American people are a great people,'" he quoted the Chinese premier as saying. "'The Chinese people are a great people. The fact that they are separated by a vast ocean and great differences in philosophy should not prevent them from finding common ground.'"

Nixon said if his talks with Communist leaders bring progress toward finding that common ground "the world will be a much safer world."

And, mentioning to the hundreds of school children on the lawn-many of them chattering excitedly as he talked- Nixon added that he hoped "all these young children there" would have a chance "to grow up in a world of peace."

Before turning to walk across a red carpet between a military honor guard to the helicopter, the chief executive said: "If there was a postscript I hope might be written in regard to this trip, it would be the words on the plaque left on the moon by our first astronauts when they landed there:

"'We came in peace for all mankind.'"

About 200 Americans-including 87 accredited news media personnel-are flying into China with Nixon, joining about 100 already there making advance arrangements.

In the months prior to the day of departure, Nixon stressed repeatedly that he had no expectation of spectacular results from the trip.

He spoke after of increased communication between mainland China and the United States-perhaps through an exchange of athletes, scholars, scientists and students.

Ginzburg to Prison on Obscenity Charge

LEWISBURG, Pa. (AP) — Publisher Ralph Ginzburg surrendered today to begin serving a three-year federal prison term for sending obscene literature through the mails. As he entered a federal building he threw a copy of the Bill of Rights into a nearby ash can.

In throwing away his copy of the Bill of Rights, he said, "Every day I remain behind bars the Bill of Rights is a meaningless piece of paper." He said he was going to prison for printing "something I believed in."

JDL Members Seek Exchange for Soviet Jews

WASHINGTON (AP) — Nine Jewish Defense League members from New York, seeking to exchange Attica convicts for Jews imprisoned in the Soviet-Union, spent part of the early morning hours in jail Thursday after a seven-hour sit-in at the office of Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass.

An aide to Kennedy said that about 30 league members entered the office about 4 p.m., and presented a letter from an Attica inmate proposing the prisoner exchange.

The inmate, a member of the "Attica Liberation Faction", wrote that inmates of the prison would be willing to live out their lives in the Soviet Union."

Humphrey Leads in Labor Polls

(AP) — Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey is running ahead of other presidential hopefuls in three polls of key AFL-CIO local leaders.

The AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education (COPE) revealed results Wednesday of polls it took among conference delegates in Atlanta, Dallas, Cincinnati and Florida. Humphrey led but received less than a majority in the three cities, with Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine running from less than 2 to 13 percentage points behind and Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington third.

Economists Say Phase II Failing

WASHINGTON (AP) — Business economists predict that big federal deficits and easy money will thwart President Nixon's effort to reduce inflation to a 2 to 3 per cent rate this year.

A consensus report from 20 economists representing major industries was delivered Thursday to nearly 100 top industrialists at a closed meeting of the Business Council with Phase 2 officials.

A summary of the panel's forecast, released to newsmen, said a majority of the economists "voice strong concern about the continued stimulation of the economy resulting from monetary and fiscal policy and the effect this may have in the form of more rapid inflation this year and in 1973."

The industry experts foresaw "a strong economy through 1972 and into 1973" but anticipated a growth of inflation across the economy averaging 3 to 4 per cent.

That matched the 3.5 per cent inflation forecast issued Wednesday by economists of the National Planning Association, except that NPA said inflation could not be held even to that rate unless "the administration succeeds in making the Phase 2 price and wage controls more effective."

The NPA report went on: "This will require marked improvements in the performance of the Price Commission, whose actions to date have certainly not been consistent with its announced target of 2.5 per cent of even the 3.5 per cent inflation rate projected here."

The NPA is a privately supported research organization with members from industry, labor and education.

Price Commission chairman C. Jackson Grayson and Pay Board chairman George H. Boldt addressed the Business Council session at which the report of the panel of economists was presented.

Raids On N. Vietnam End

SAIGON (AP) — U.S. warplanes ended two days of heavy raids Thursday against Soviet-supplied, long-range artillery and antiaircraft air defenses inside North Vietnam.

The U.S. Command reported planes-which flew about 150 strikes-met intense antiaircraft fire and more than a dozen surface-to-air missiles-SAMS.

"The area where we struck just north of the DMZ is heavily defended," a command spokesman said. "A lot of effort was expended in antiaircraft suppression, keeping down the SAMS and the antiaircraft fire so that other planes could look for the long-range artillery guns."

One Air Force F4 Phantom was shot down, and its two-man crew is missing, the command said. Radio Hanoi claimed North Vietnamese forces shot down seven U.S. planes, capturing and killing a number of pilots. the U.S. Command refused to comment on the report.

Command policy is not to reveal aircraft losses until search and rescue operations for any downed pilots are completed, on the grounds that such a disclosure could endanger the search.

The command said 10 "protective reaction" strikes were flown against antiaircraft and missile sites in an area just north of the eastern part of the DMZ.

It said only about 100 American advisers and technical personnel were within actual range of the guns at Quang Tri and South Vietnamese fire bases just south of the DMZ.

LONDON--Police brace themselves against struggling coal-miners, who are on strike, as they arrived Tuesday at the English Houses of Parliament with their supporters. The strikers intended to lobby members of Parliament. (AP)

Power Crisis Hits Northern Ireland

LONDON (AP)-Britain's power crisis spread to Northern Ireland for the first time Thursday, adding an order for four daily electrcity cuts to the province's troubles.

At the same time, the government warned that power cuts already hitting homes and factories across Britain for up to 12 hours a day will be increased next Wednesday unless the crisis is settled. The blackouts in Northern Ireland begin at 7 a.m. Friday.

Industry Minister John Davies told Parliament that even with these further cuts, power plants can be kept running only until the end of next week.

After that, a shutdown of all but emergency services is inevitable, he said, halting the bulk of British industry.

Hope of averting additional cuts depends on an early settlement of the six-week-old coal miners' strike that has starved electric generating plants of fuel supplies, Davies added. The power cuts have been ordered to conserve dangerously low supply levels.

A government-named inquiry into the miners' pay dispute planned to work into the night to ready a proposed settlement formula by Friday as promised.

Employment minister Robert Carr asked leaders of the miners union and the state-run Coal Board to be in his office Friday morning to look at the outlines of the inquiry board's recommendations.

The Coal Board has promised to honor any suggestions drawn up by the mediators.

The miners have said only that if the recommendations are acceptable to the union leadership, the pickets outside power plants can be called off immediately and new coal supplies let in.

But the actual end to the strike will have to await a ballot by the union's 280,000 members, a process that should take at least a week.

Removal of the pickets would lift the threat of a nearly complete power breakdown halting British industry. But further delays in getting the miners back to work are expected to keep coal supplies below normal for many months.

Industrial shutdowns from the power shortage already have sent the nation's unemployment total soaring above 2.5 million and Davies said the figure could reach 3 million next week.

Davies told Parliament the cuts ordered so far had reduced electric output to about 65 per cent of demand. He refused to disclose the size of the further cuts planned for Wednesday. Industry is now on a three-day week.

Hughes To Visit Nicaragua

MANAGUA, Nicaragua (AP)-Howard Hughes has abandoned his seclusion in the Bahamas for a visit to Nicaragua and possibly a later trip to the United States. Sources here and in Las Vegas, Nev., said the 66-year-old recluse arrived Thursday in this Central American capital.

The office of President Anastasio Somoza, himself a multimillionaire, announced that Hughes had accepted his invitation to visit Nicaragua.

Informed sources said Hughes' visit to Managua was arranged Wenesday night by the U.S. ambassador to Nicaragua, Turner Shelton, who reportedly has a home in the Bahamas and is a friend of the U.S. billionaire.

An Eastern Air Lines Jetstar, which was believed to have brought Hughes to this Central American republic, landed at the Nicaraguan air force strip near the municipal airport at 9:15 a.m.

There was speculation that Hughes was staying either at Shelton's residence or Somoza's ranch outside the city.

Sources in Washington said Hughes had arrived at Miami, Fla., at 4:30 a.m., EST, Thursday on board his yacht from the Bahamas.

Other U.S. sources said Hughes' visit to Nicaragua would be brief. They added he might return then to the United States for a meeting with the news media.

Hughes's sudden departure from his hotel suite in Nassau, Bahamas, comes in the midst of New York court hearings on Clifford Irving's purported "Autobiography of Howard Hughes", a book that has been called a hoax by Time magazine.

The Las Vegas Review-Journal in Nevada quoted Hughes sources as saying it wasn't the billionaire's intention to stay long in Nicaragua.

"This is just a temporary stop. We expect him to arrive in the United States shortly and there is a good chance he will hold a face-to-face press conference.

Another Hughes source in Las Vegas said Hughes eventually plans to go toMexico to live permanently.

The announcement by the office of Nicaragua's president quoted Somoza as saying: "In view of the business conversations that we have been having with representatives of the Hughes Tool Co., I am very pleased that Mr. Hughes has accepted my invitation to come to visit us."

State Department sources in Washington said they understood Hughes has business interests in Nicaragua.

Somoza had alreadyleft Managua by the time of the announcement for a previously scheduled official visit to Panama.

It was believed Hughes would remain in Nicaragua until the president's return Saturday or Sunday.

The Somoza family has run Nicaragua since 1936, except for a four-year interim.

Somoza's interests include shipping, the national airline, cattle ranches, fishing, plywood, textiles and buildings.

Nicaragua lies on the Central American neck between Honduras and Costa Rica. It is only about half the size of Nevada, where Hughes last lived in the United States.

The country is the largest-50,193 square miles-and the least densely populated-2 million people-of the so-called "banana republics" of Central America.

In his usual manner, Hughes slipped secretively away from his hotel in Nassau where he had been secluded for 15 months.

A caro plane carrying a hospital bed, blood plasma stand, bottled water and many other items from the Hughes' ninth-floor suite in the Britannia Beach Hotel flew early Thursday to Fort Lauderdale, Fla. then on to Managua.

Soviets Await Release

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP)-Three Soviet fishing officers await release today after a month in U.S. custody on charges of illegal fisheries support activity in an American fishing zone.

The men were fined $80,000 in U.S. District Court Wednesday after changing their pleas from innocent to no contest. A finding of guilty was directed after the change.

G. Kent Edwards, U.S. attorney for Alaska, said the officers would be released after their fines were paid. The money was expected to be forwarded to the Justice Department from the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

Edwards also announced Wednesday that an out-of-court agreement had resulted in a $170,000 assessment against the two Soviet fishing vessels which were seized by the Coast Guard Jan. 17. The vessels had been liable to confiscation.

Vladimir Artemov, master of an 80-ship Soviet herring fleet working the Boring Sea, and Igor Bovtun, skipper of the 362-foot factory ship Lamut, were fined $30,000 each. Nikolai Pavluk, master of the trawler Kolyvan, was fined $20,000.

The Soviet ships were seized by the cutter Storis about nine miles from St. Matthew Island, an uninhabited dot about 200 miles off the western Alaskan coast.

The Lamut then attempted to flee but was recaptured.

Fighting The 'No-Vote' Theory

Perhaps, the easiest political philosophy to espouse, is the "no vote" theory. The decided difficulty of choosing a candidate, that you believe, deserving of your ballot, is rather easily sloughed off; if, indeed, one practices (?) this current philosophy. What is more natural than doing nothing?

Change, the goal we are seeking, or waiting for, can be obtained in a variety of ways. Possibly, the only method, yet untried, is the power of the vote. Have you ever entertained the thought, of the power possible, if an honest attempt were made? It is possible to exchange, what now exists, by utilizing a commmunity approach towards voting. In this community, the point is evident. The possibilities are startling.

Because the vote is so system, the controllers, the protectors of this system have no doubt that apathy and disinterest will elect our new aristocracy.

In Amherst, important issues of housing, discrimination, child-care centers, recreational facilities, and community control of the police are but a few cases in point.

If you consider Amherst your residence, and you don't like the ways things are, then it is your responsibility to change them. You must register to vote, because, if you fail, you can't pull the lever on election day. When election day comes be aware of the candidates, and what or who they represent. Enter the booth. If no one appeals, vote against them by not pulling any, but the main lever.

Do something though! Don't just sit in the Hatch.

Register to vote.

Voter Registration Committee

Four For Selectman - Why You Should Vote

The question asked to the four candidates for selectman by Susan Roy, Special Assistant on Voter Registration was:
In your opinion, why is it important that students vote in town elections?

Bob Garvey

A student spends the better part of four years of his life in Amherst; therefore, it is very important that during this period he is heard in local government. A vote many times represents his only defense against the conspicuous exploitation of students.

My platform is based on a commitment to better representation for all constituents within our community.

Frank Decker

The students should register because it is a privilege and a duty to exercise the right to vote and something to be very proud of. Another reason why students should register is in order to vote in state and national elections. If they wish to participate in the town elections they should take into consideration the impact that their collective vote may have on the town, bearing in mind that they are possibly transients. The results of their vote may be in effect long after they had left the campus. If they want to vote in town elections, they should take particular care to be informed as to what's going on in the town. If they want to work in the town government, they should make it known to the town officials that they want to work, say, on the town boards. There has to be a report. The student voice should be heard so the students can take voting in town elections seriously.

Leo Bouchard

No system of government has ever responded to a constituency who did not make its desires known. Students of voting age comprise the majority of residents in Amherst. If they want to be heard, it is essential that they participate in the town election process.

Stephen Keedy

In a democratic society all members should participate. I do not differentiate between groups with in the local community. It is my belief that it is important that all groups within the local community participate, so that local government will be truely representative and function for the good of the total community.

The Mechanics Of Voting

By RICHARD M. HOWLAND

On February 22 the Town of Amherst will elect two Selectmen, a member of the School Committee, the Moderator, a member of the Housing Authority and one-third of the representatives to the Town Meeting. Over a thousand students have registered to be eligible to vote in this election and I wonder how many will actually vote at all, much less vote intelligently.

As I see it, the democratic principle enjoins any thoughful person from criticizing another's decision to vote ignorantly or not at all. To cast a vote without knowledge is an inalienable right; it reflects an individual's perhaps unconscious determination to react to the stimuli of life subliminally. He chooses, usually, the candidate who has the most money by putting his name in the voters' way most persistently. My own disagreement with this type of decision is that by analogy this person's involvement with politics is kind of like sex with vegetables–a very plastic and unrewarding experience in the long run.

The person who chooses not to vote at all makes, I suppose, the more valuable decision. He does not vote stupidly (defined here as against his own views and interests) and does not louse up anybody else's sincere effort to make the human political system work (no matter how fruitless that may from time to time appear). He or she at least does not cast a vote against progress. The vice here seems to me to be that slavery, even of a voluntary nature, is objectionable and tactly abhorred by the Constitution if not the people. Another consequence which is somewhat irrelevant, I suppose, is that the nonparticipant really isn't entitled to glorify his wretchedness by claim to the term "victim" or "casualty" of the system.

The extension of the right to vote to younger people substantially at any logical place they may be inclined to vote is really a terrific philosophical victory for progressive causes. The triumphs are twofold: one, younger, active people have the opportunity to express themselves within the system, if they choose to; and, two, all people, young or not student or not, have the opportunity to vote easily where they find themselves.

The decision to vote in Amherst is really a matter of comparative alternatives. If the potential voter is usually in a town, most of the year, probably it is sensible to vote there. At any rate, if the potential voter is seldom or never in another town it makes pretty ridiculous sense to vote there. Personal considerations may suggest deffereing results.

However, Amherst certainly is the community where a vast number of students live, work and, to be sure, play. If it is unresponsive to the needs of this vast population it is not now nor will it hereafter be the fault of the town or its folk, at least not alone. The burden for whatever guilt is levied upon Amherst will be shared by those who live here and either do not register or register and do not vote or register and vote without taking the modest amount of time required to vote intelligently. Those for whom the citizen relationship with Amherst as a town and community is predictably less than total and long term nevertheless serve in many ways as guardians for those who will inevitably follow in their path. It seems to me that those who have gone to the trouble to register and now don't vote are in fact condemning their fellows now and in the future to a role of silence and non-effect on the local scene. I hope, sincerely, that they won't fail to consider their responsibility and then to vote their views and opinions on February 22 and thereafter again and again.

QUALIFICATIONS?
"My experience on various town committees and my active involvement in civic affairs for many years in Amherst has enabled me to appreciate the town's advantages as well as its problems. I feel that working with interested citizens has permitted me to demonstrate an ability to provide direction. My time is flexible enough to devote the long hours necessary for the performance of the duties as selectman."

PROBLEMS?
"I feel that the most urgent problems facing the town officials today are growth-related. It is my opinion that the town can properly regulate and direct the necessary growth, if we apply the concept that we have an obligation to provide for the needs of all people and the right to insist on the protection of the environment. I would favor improved planning, leadership by selectmen and citizen participation in the resulting action."

FRANK A. DECKER JR.

QUALIFICATIONS?
"I have been a resident and taxpayer in Amherst since 1951. My education at Williams College and the Federal Technical Institute (Zurich), military service as a Captain in the U.S. Army, and varied management and personnel positions provide the experience needed for a position on the Board of Selectmen. In Amherst, I have been a Town Meeting Member, chairman of the Development and Industrial Commission, a member of the Center School Complex Committee, and active in the North Amherst Church. My present position as a personnel consultant allows a flexible schedule..."

PROBLEMS?
"Many of the problems facing the town are related to the expansion of our educational institutions. We need to be prepared for the immediate and future needs of our town. Development should proceed on a planned and orderly basis. One of the consequences of growth will be the need for new or expanded town facilities — water, sewers, roads, housing, recreation, and conservation. The optimum for each tax dollar spent must be obtained by careful consideration and equating requirements with availability."

QUALIFICATIONS?
"I have lived in Amherst 34 years and have been very interested in ... town government. I feel that I would bring to the position a great deal of enthusiasm and a desire to try new ideas...I have had the opportunity to organize and serve on many active committees which have been concerned with specific ecological problems of this area.

"It seems to me...important that a selectman be willing to study the various programs...being sponsored by the town."

PROBLEMS?
"I see the rapid growth of Amherst as one of the most pressing problems facing the town...The Board of Selectmen must play an active role in seeing that expansion is still in keeping with the original intent of the town...We must be prepared to provide the town with additional water and sewer services, as well as traffic arteries.

"Finally, I feel we must become increasingly aware of...programs to help us alleviate the financial burden on the taxpayer."

QUALIFICATIONS?
"Six years as a Selectman of the town of Amherst. Sixteen years as an independent business man. A life-long resident of the town of Amherst. An understanding of Amherst's past, a participation in Amherst's present and understanding of what is needed for Amherst's future.

"The time demands required for this position are continually increasing. At the present time I would estimate I spend eight to 12 hours weekly...I am prepared to give the time required to this position if re-elected.

PROBLEMS?
"The most pressing problem facing Amherst today is the supplying of municipal services (water, roads, refuge disposal, sewers, schools, recreation, conservation, police and fire protection), in a growing community while trying to maintain a level real estate tax rate and an excellent living environment. to this end I would hope that SCOG would give the Board of Selectmen the direction the town wishes to go and I would work to implement the mechanics to achieve these ends...Long-range planning must be used and must be continually reviewed and updated..."

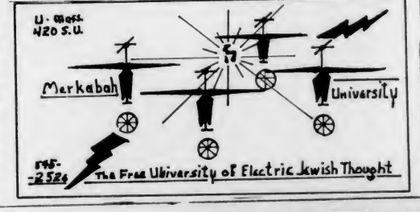
COMMITTEE DUTIES?
"School Committee members should become familiar with background information...should investigate problems on location when necessary, and should visit other school systems...School Committee members should also be available to (and take the initiative) to talk with parents, teachers and students...



"My experience includes that of a teacher, parent and member of parent-teacher groups, member of SCO, officer and active participant in the League of Women Voters of Amherst..."

KATHERINE H. SCHOENBERGER

Housewife

COMMITTEE DUTIES?
"Members should attend school activities, such as concerts, plays, sports and exhibits, to get the 'feel' of students, faculty and parents as people, not just statistics. As a parent of three students, I am familiar with the changes in teaching, curriculum and facilities that have occurred in the past eight years. As a woman, I can add a point of view lacking in an all-male committee."

Supersession

I had been thinking about writing an article on the plight of our exiled Americans in Canada for some time, but other things have always intervened. Now I see that I have been superceded in that task, but the editorial which appeared in Tuesday's Collegian was not what I had in mind. So I will cast aside my reading of John Hersey's Hiroshima and give you some of my own thoughts on the subject.

Six years too late for fifty thousand Americans and countless of Vietnamese, we can at last see the light at the end of the tunnel in Vietnam. It has been along and tragic war for everyone involved and thus its consequences too could not help but be tragic. Perhaps one of its supreme ironies is the fact that If Eisenhower had allowed free elections to take place in 1956 as called for in the Geneva Accords, as Mr. Nixon now seems willing to do, the war might never of happened, but all of that is too little and too late now. The fact is that American Liberalism went to war in 66-67 covering its tragic error in a cloak of patriotism only to find in the end after three years of war that might does not always make right.

Whether it is stated or implied a majority of the American people now recognize that the war was a mistake, but this was far from being the case in the beginning. Yet even at the start there were a few who viewed the war as a mistake and when the time came when they too would be forced to participate in this mass madness they had the difficult choice between jail and exile. Some followed Thoreau's example and sacrificed three to five years of their lives within the decayed dens of inequity that America calls prison. Their own moral example could only be ironically and tragically enhanced by the fact that those who killed unarmed women and children in Vietnam were given lighter sentences than they, if they were sentenced at all. There were others who for varying reasons choose a different course. Perhaps they thought of the well-being of their parents, of their wives and children , and concluded that they could not afford to spend five years in prison making a moral statement while their relatives worked or went on welfare. Perhaps they considered the stigma that a prison record would leave and the trouble they would have getting a job after they got out. Yet most of all perhaps they were disillusioned and angry at a country which forced them to make such a choice.

Whether they left before they were inducted or whether they deserted after they had been in Vietnam and saw what it was really or whether they were Black and could see no logic in going to Vietnam to kill Asians while Blacks were being killed in Mississippi, or for whatever reason, they were the victims of the American Dream that stated this was a nation of liberty and justice for all which had turned into the American Nightmare under the pressure of War.

Those who support amnesty can cite precedents going back to Ancient Greece. But it is not my purpose here to bore non-history majors, so I will cite only one example. While the incident itself is not the same, for history does not repeat itself, the precedent is the same. It is a fact that the conclusion of the American Civil War witnessed only one war crimes trial. Not one of the thousands of Confederate soldiers, some of whom were former union officers, congressmen and judges, who betrayed their duty to uphold the constituion in favor of destroying it, were ever brought to trial. At the conclusion of the Civil War both Lincoln and congress turned to bind up the nation's wounds, "with malice toward none; with charity for all." I would humbly submit that if traitors who fought to destroy the nation and uphold slavery can be forgiven than perhaps people who took the position that they could not take part in an immoral war, a position which a majority of the country now supports, mights also be forgiven. It is time that we set about binding up the wounds that were inflicted by this war and I believe amnesty is a step in that direction.

Those who oppose amnesty usually base their case on the sanctity of the law. I agree with the sanctity of law, but I am struck by the irony of a law which punishes people for refusing to participate in a war which most people now agree to be immoral. I am in favor of a government of laws and not of men, but I realize that when a law makes a conscientious act a crime, it undermines its very foundation. You have but to look at Prohibition to see the fate of laws which override reasonable desires. In conclusion I would like to quote from His Honor Judge Charles Wyzanski Jr:

"When the state through its laws, seeks to override reasonable moral commitments it makes a dangerously uncharacteristic choice. The law grows from the deposits of morality. Law and morality are, in turn, debtors of each other...The true secret of legal might lies in the habits of conscientious men disciplining themselves to obey the law they respect without the necessstty of judicial and administrative orders. When the law treats a reasonable conscientious act as a crime, it subverts its own power. It invites civil disobedience. It impairs the very habits which preserve the law."

The Red China Lobby Crowd

WASHINGTON--Whether President Nixon planned it or not, his trip to China has created an elite White House press corps that has split the correspondents in Washington asunder.

By choosing 87 TV commentators, technicians, newspapermen and columnists out of 2,000 applicants, Mr. Nixon has conferred the nearest thing to knighthood on the correspondents making the trip.

For the past week the White House press room has been divided between those who got their cholera shots and those who didn't.

"The Red China Lobby Crowd," as they are bitterly referred to by the newspapermen who aren't going, were easy to identify because they kept waving the Little Red Books of Mao Tse-tung during last week's press briefings.

They also could be found in the Executive Office Building cafeteria eating their chili and beans with chopsticks.

In fairness to the Red China Lobby Crowd, they tried to keep a low profile once the list of those who would accompany President Nixon was posted. Many went out of their way to be nice to those who hadn't been chosen. One of them gave out free fortune cookies during Henry Kissinger's briefings. Another served jasmine tea during a poker game in the lounge. Others handed out bowls of rice to their news-hungry fellow correspondents.

But despite this outward display of friendship, there was a feeling on the part of those who weren't going with President Nixon that the Red China Lobby Crowd was patronizing them.

There was nothing anyone could put his finger on, but there was little things that added up. One correspondent who was making the trip refused to take off his quilted Mao jacket in the press room. Another had his name in Chinese plastered on his portable typewriter, and still another man kept referring to those who weren't going as "counter-revolutionaries."

Adding insult to injury, the 87 elitists did exercises every morning in front of a portrait of Mao on the White House lawn. This was followed by a 10-mile swim down the Potomac, where they shouted slogans of support for the Cultural Revolution.

As if this weren't enough, some of the Red China Lobby Crowd started to confess their sins publicly in front of Ron Ziegler and asked to be sent to state farms after their trip so they could be "rehabilitated."

One White House correspondent who had been turned down said, "I don't give a damn how the elitists behave now. But it's when they come back from the trip that they'll be insufferable. After eight days in China they'll all be experts, and God help us when they start spinning their tales of what happened to them when they visited a tire factory in Peking."

Another disgruntled White House correspondent said, "I can just hear future White House briefings when every question by the elitists will be preceded by 'Ron, when Chou En-lai told us...' or 'As you recall, Ron, you denied in Shanghai...'"

It is obvious that the White House press room will never be the same again. By making his trip to China, Mr. Nixon has beenable to destroy the morale of the press corps forever. Using divide-and-conquer tactics, he has managed to turn brother correspondent against brother.

When the elitists return from their trip and start talking down to those who didn't go, there could be a lot of blood spilled on the White House press lounge floor. The President may not have resolved his diplomatic problems by going to Peking, but he has put the men covering him at the White House in disarray and that, as Vice President Agnew would agree, is worth all the tea in China.

Letters To The Editor

WMPIRG As Opposed To Brand X

To the Editor:

Krausman's letter on Thursday attacking WMPIRG's tax concept misses the point. Precisely because so many of the groups which harm the public interest in our society have institutional access to our resources regardless of our opinions, that such a broad resource base is vital for effective public interest groups. WMPIRG's tax may superficially appear as a similarly involuntary method, but the important difference is that it is voluntary. Not only that, WMPIRG will be completely democratic and prevented by its charter from affiliating with other groups. To deny an interest group access, especially voluntary access, to its constituency's support, in a pluralistic society which operates largely on interest group influence and the bargaining process to develop policy, is to effectively cripple that group in its attempt to truly influence the public policy process.

The appeal to "freedom of action" in Krausman's letter concerns the weakest interest; the public, as opposed to the government and private interests which have enormous control over our resources. In a situation wherein large powerful interests dominate policy processes, the ideal situation of simply reducing their power won't just "happen" without the rise of a counter-balancing power. Obviously WMPIRG won't have millions of dollars and the aid of many retired regulatory officers to influence public policy as many industries have, but Nader has shown that this nation is not yet so corrupt or cynical that facts have no force.

Almost any industry you name has trade associations, or is oligopolistic--concentrated enough to act in concert, or is an outright monopoly--like utilities. These solidified interest groups have access to our resources through their pricing power. Your electric bill not only contains costs of producing power and administrating the process, but also the costs of influencing rate commissioners, of using lengthy legal processes to intimidate challengers, of influencing political appointments, and orienting public opinion through advertising campaigns to the view of the industry. The oligopolistic auto industry and highway lobby team offers us no real basic choice in transportation modes and so we must work especially hard to counteract their all-embracing influence.

When we are denied access to and challenge of dossiers concerning ourselves, it would be absurd for us to cripple our attempts to reestablish personal integrity by giving those we oppose access to social resources while preventing a movement on our behalf somewhat similar resources.

The basic difficulty is between individual or group identification. I see no problem. The pursuit of individual goals through groups, like it or not, is a hallmark of mass societies. The trouble comes when people refuse to recognize that individual goals can be effected through groups simply because of an attachment to an individual style.

Professional Assessment

To the Editor:

The column, "Just Keeping Them Under Control" in the Feb. 2nd issue dealing with the use of certain medications with children deserves comment. It is a common matter, not often pondered on, that any idea, event or assumption can be presented in whatever way the writer wishes, more or less consciously, reflecting his biases, ideology or ignorance and its public statement creates a certain impact. When names and quotes are used, the article has a convincingly authoritative finality, and ends in raising emotions ranging from fear to outrage. As a matter of fact, this article is biased and lacking basic information and objectivity about certain medications for children with the hyperkinetic syndrome.

I do not question durg companies making profits from the drugs they manufacture; this is not news. All one has to do is to watch TV, read medical journals and note the endless expensive advertising brochures to realize that it is not a unique plot involving Ritalin (as it is correctly spelled). In a merchandising, profit making culture, that is the way it is.

Nor do I question that there are misues of drugs and I refer to the present fad of young people using amphetamines and other drugs heedlessly and dangerously. But I do hold that misuses with children are far more rare than this article claims to be the case. Most pediatricians practice their profession with meticulous responsibility for the well-being of the child and are not pawns of rigid, manipulating teachers. The hysteria that resulted from the lurid expose in the Washington Post two years ago (and then picked up by non-medical "experts") has led to confusion and blind emotion in the lay public - who at times takes upon itself expertise that they would never do if one had ulcers, a pain in the lungs or a broken leg.

These medications do NOT "tranquilize" children, they do NOT turn them into zombies IF this is the proper medication for those certain children. They, in fact, become happier with themselves because they can direct themselves and make decisions. The medication is not used unless appropriate, discontinued at once if found inappropriate (as it would make them even more boistrous). It is not addictive according to those physicians who have studied the drug for many years. Misuse and overdose are not the drug's fault and no responsible person would advocate its use as a way of dulling children to poverty and its disastrous effects.

If the reader wants a sound professional assessment, I suggest that he send for the official report of the ad hoc committee from HEW authorized by Congress after the already referred to scandal.

The Letter

Dear Mr. Stoneham:

We of the Rents and Fees Committee of the Student Senate unanimously feel that any increase in board cannot be borne by the student body as a whole.

We hope that you can find a means by which you can maintain the present board fees. We would also appreciate your notifying us of any changes in food service which may be necessary to maintain the present fees.

Rick Savini
Food Service Representative
Rents & Fees Committee

Solution

To the Editor:

To justify the WMPIRG issue by a comparison to a democratic voting procedure is absurd. I have never heard of an election that was run in which the voters had to go to the polls to get their vote back.

The solution to the WMPIRG problem seems obvious. Let WMPIRG's request for $2 per student be placed on the tuition bill and let the students pay it if they please. This would allow those who do not want to pay the $2 and also don't think that another line to wait in is worth $2, to keep their money. At the same time it would provide a convenient channel for those who are interested in WMPIRG to contribute while removing most of the coersive nature of the tax as it now stands.

Did you ever think that Dick's China trip is really a plot between Agnew and the Chinese to take over the country? They kidnap Nixon, Agnew declares a state of emergency and cancels elections. Actually, Clifford Irving is behind the whole thing.

Take-Off

Over Minnesota you have to put on heavy pants
Because the air gets nippy.
But then, as we get to Mississippi
The wind dies down, the cold has no chance,
And my body knows your heat.
Your breath is really sweet.

This state of close affairs
Should never really end.
I think it quite appropriate to defend

Political Organization

To the Editor:

Individual's rights desperately need to be advocated in today's corporate society. I suspect that the programs of WMPIRG could be a significant step toward that goal. However, the proposed funding by mandatory refundable student tax is wrong and should be changed. The reasons for this follow:

1. Previous correspondence notwithstanding, "non-partisan" does not equal "non-political." (Political, adj. Of or pertaining to the exercise of the rights and privileges or the influence by which individuals or groups of individuals seek to determine public policy."-Webster's 2nd International). WMPIRG is a political organization.

2. The proposed refundable tax is extortionary. It would force students, at the risk of not being able to register, to surrender money to an organization; money they can only regain after additional nuisance. I see little distinction between the proposed funding procedure and a student walking up to me with a club in his hand saying, "Give me a dollar! I need it for a good cause. Otherwise I'll floor you!" And as he runs away, he hollers over his shoulder, "Hey joker, if you want it back go, to the cashier's office sometime." (Admittedly, a round trip to the cashier's office may only take 45 minutes (depending on lines) but there is a strong principle involved here. A minority has a right not to have money extorted from it for a use it either doesn't support or doesn't know if it supports, even with a "money-back guarantee".

3. What actions are in the "public interest"? Every attempt to answer this question will evoke a strong disagreement from some section of the "public". Even indications of majority agreement, such as sought in the present petition campaign, does not necessarily imply validity. For how long did the majority of this country support slavery? One man's public interest is another man's oppression. Further, in any funding scheme other than direct solicitation, WMPIRG will not have to define its concept of "public interest" or its proposed activities to every holder of a $2 receipt. It will be up to the student to go out of his or her way to determine if WMPIRG's cause is good, rather than the burden of proof being on WMPIRG to prove its worthiness to potential contributors.

4. The apology seen in recent Collegians that "no mandatory tax will mean no public interest group" is both obfuscatory and ludicrous. Are we to accept a statement that abrogation of individual rights is o.k. because WMPIRG maintains that its tax the "only viable" way to achieve its goals? It seems clear that WMPIRG's mandatory funding mechanism is in direct conflict with its own goal of public interest protection.

5. There is an established procedure for the funding of student organizations through application to the Student Senate for RSO funds. Do we want to establish the precedent of taxes for specific student endeavors being added to every bill?

Unfortunately, WMPIRG has embarked on its campaign with an uncomfortable amount of self-righteousness. The organizers should admit that perhaps their program represents a segment of the public interest and their will should not be forced on others. The course of direct solicitation for funds or an optional fee at registration may be possibilities. The point is, that, although easier, a mandatory refundable tax is not fair and not honest and must not go forward lest we have a group advocating individual rights which is predicted upon ignoring individual rights.

FUJI MICRO SAFETY N

Malik Hakim Object Of Manhunt

BOSTON (AP)-Gov. Francis W. Sargent said Thursday he gave Roxbury community leader Malik Hakim a chance to turn himself in because he was afraid there might be violence if he left the arrest up to the police.

Sargent signed extradition papers for Hakim Wednesday and then privately informed Hakim's lawyer.

Instead of giving himself up, however, Hakim dropped from sight and has been the object of a state police manhunt.

Hakim fled before he could be taken into custody to face charges in Missouri of violation of parole, rape and attempted murder. He was charged under the name of Albert Bradford.

"My reaction is that it's unfortunate he did this," the governor said. "I suppose Hakim's reaction was 'the jig is up. I better get out of here.' " Sargent told newsmen that he had promised to tell Hakim's lawyers when he reached a decision on whether to sign extradition papers. He said he told them of the signing about an hour before he made it public.

The governor said he was told by one of the lawyers, William Homans Jr., that Hakim would surrender.

Hakim's failure to do so, Sargent said, was a source of "consternation and embarrassment" to Homans. He said he did not believe that Hakim was "intentionally tipped" that the papers had been signed.

Sargent said he feated that "physical damage might result" if police moved in to make the arrest.

Gene McNary, St. Louis County prosecutor, said it was the third time Bradford fled to escape prosecution. "I wonder if the governor Sargent would go to bat for him now...we don't look at him as any kind of hero," McNary said.

Hakim, recognized by many as an effective leader and worker in the black community, was arrested in Boston May 17.

Several groups urged Sargent not to sign the extradition papers, but, after a long delay, he did. Hakim subsequently was released by Suffolk Superior Court because of a technicality involving identification.

A second set of extradition papers was delivered last Friday.

Sargent wrote Missouri Gov. Warren E. Hearnes that Hakim "had earned a place in the community here."

He said in the letter that he signed the extradition papers "because the charges against this man are too serious for me to do otherwise. The state of Missouri has the right and the responsibility to its citizens to prosecute the case it has prepared."

"Further, the accused deserves his day in court, his chance to refute the charges leveled against him," Sargent wrote.

Gilday Removed From Courtroom

BOSTON (AP)-William Gilday Jr., on trial for the slaying of a Boston policeman, was ordered removed from the courtrrom for the second day in a row Thursday after he tried to question a witness himself.

Judge Walter H. McLaughlin ordered Gilday locked up in a cell directly beneath the courtroom where he could listen to the proceedings over a loudspeaker.

During the 10-minute exchange, the judge asked Gilday to sit quietly in the dock, and Gilday interrupted him, but neither raised his voice.

Gilday is charged with killing patrolman Walter H. Schroeder during a $26,500 robbery of a branch of the State Street Bank and Trust Co. in Sept. 1970.

Gilday insisted that he be allowed to sit with his attorney, Daniel Featherston, because "I make all the final decisions."

The judge warned that he would not allow Gilday "to be a loud, boisterous participant in this trial."

Gilday replied, "I will stand up for my rights in this matter. The jury is prejudiced against me. You had people prospective jurors come in here and deliberately lie under oath."

Ater Gilday's remarks, the trial proceeded, and a former teller of the robbed bank took the stand.

However, Gilday began to question him, and McLaughlin ordered Gilday removed.

Later in the proceedings, a surprise government witness testified that Gilday admitted that "he had robbed the bank and killed a police officer."

But before the witness, Alan McGrory, testified, the judge ordered the jury out of the courtroom. The testimony will not become a formal part of the case unless the judge rules that the jurors may hear it.

McGrory, a student at Northeastern University , said Gilday told him that he was "in a thing, a revolutionary cause."

Navy To Curtail Graduate Study Programs

WASHINGTON (AP)-Secretary John H. Chafee says the Navy is pulling out of graduate study programs at up to 15 colleges and universities, primarily in the Ivy League, at the direction of the House Armed Services Committee.

Chafee quoted House Armed Services Chairman F. Edward Hebert, D-La., as indicating Congress might prohibit the services by law from sending officers to graduate schools where ROTC training has been stopped by law if the services do not phase out their programs at such schools on their own.

Chafee made the comments in a letter to Rep. Robert F. Drinan, D-Mass., who had asked whether it was true that the Navy was prohibiting any new enrollment of its officers at 15 colleges and universities.

Without confirming the number or the list of colleges and universities that Drinan provided, Chafee replied that the congressman's information was "essentially correct."

Drinan charged that it was outrageous for the Navy to take such a step at the insistence of one House committee or its chairman.

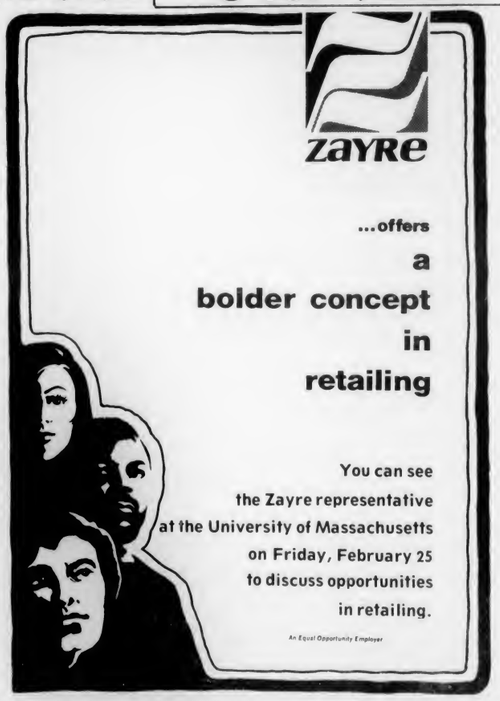
"It's vindicative, coercive, retaliatory and it cuts off our nose to spite our face," Drinan said.

He said the list of colleges and universities to which a Naval officer told him Navy graduate students are no longer permited to apply-the list Chafee called "essentially correct"-included Boston College, Boston University, Brown University, Colgate University, Columbia University, Dartmouth, Harvard, Hobart and William Smith College, New York University, Pratt Institute, Princeton, Stanford, State University at Buffalo, Tufts University and Yale.

Chafee's letter said "I share with your concern for the loss to the Navy and the nation of the excellent relationships previously experienced with the institutions."

But Chafee said the reason the Navy is phasing graduate student officers off those campuses was a House Armed Services Committee report last year saying "it is morally wrong for the military to spend dollars sending students to a particular college or university which has chosen not to cooperate with the military services."

Chafee quoted the Dec. 7 Hebert letter as saying in part: "It is our hope that it will not be necessary to place a flat prohibition against sending students to these universities which have withdrawn from the ROTC program when we consider the procurement bill next year but if it is necessary to legislate on this subject, legislate we will."



Financial Aid applications for the Summer of 1972 and the 1972-73 academic year are now available in the Financial Aid Office, Room 232, Whitmore. Applications will be available from now until 5:00 P.M., Tuesday, February 29 and must be filed no later than March 1. Whether or not aid has been received previously, a new application must be filed each year for all Loans, Scholarships, Grants and Work Study.

N.H. Bombing Suspect Jailed

MANCHESTER, N.H. (AP)-Jaan Karl Laaman, 23, charged in connection with what a state official said were political bombings that also were planned for President Nixon's New Hampshire primary headquarters, was transferred from ahospital to jail Thursday.

Laaman, of Buffalo, N.Y., also listed as Karl A. Laaman, had been hospitalized with a hand injury following his arrest Wednesday night with a woman after three bombs blew out the windows of police and fire headquarters. A fourth bomb failed to go off. No fireman or policeman was hurt.

Laaman, an organizer of the University of New Hampshire chapter of Students for a Democratic Society and former inmate of Atica State Prison, was first taken to police headquarters. Only his left hand was fingerprinted because his right was in a cast. A torn and bloodied glove was found at the site of the explosions, police said.

After being photographed by police, he was taken to the nearby Hillsboro County Jail where Kathryn A. Holt, 21, with addresses in Buffalo, Boston and Portsmouth and Dover, N.H., was incarcerated Wednesday.

Both face a Feb. 25 preliminary hearing on a variety of state and federal charges. A total of $60,000 bail has been set for the pair.

Atty. Gen. Warren Rudman said letters intended for newspapers taken during the arrest and indicated the "People's Liberation Army" had planned the bombings, including the blowing up of Nixon's primary headquarters in the state's largest city. He said the attacks also were connected to an anti-war demonstration at the headquarters Saturday in which 12 persons were arrested during a talk by George Romney, secretary of housing and urban development.

Rudman said security at headquarters of various candidates in the city had been increased but declined to go into details. He said Treasury and FBI agents had joined the investigation.

In Buffalo, police said they wanted to question the woman and Laaman in connection with a bombing Jan. 5 at the General Donovan State Office Building.

Laaman, who was an organizer of the first SDS chapter at the state university, and Miss Holt had dropped out although university officials gave no reason for their withdrawal.

In an interview in November of 1969, Laaman said that "the SDS does believe in justified militant action." He had noted that "we're an organization of the left and this includes Communists. We do not deny them membership."

Mobe Teach-in

On Monday, Feb. 14 the Student Mobe met to further plan the Feb. 23 AIR WAR TEACH-IN. The teach-in will be held in room 163 in the Campus Center from 12:00 to 3:00 p.m. in the afternoon and will feature a special slide-show concerning the increased bombings and air attacks on Vietnam. The show was prepared by a team of American Friends Service Committee and describes the continuing air war in Indochina and the nature, use and effects of the Electronic Battlefield (E.B.)

Egbal Ahmad To Speak

Eqbal Ahmad will be in the Springfield area this weekend to speak on "The Trial of the Harrisburg Eight".

He is one of the eight accused of conspiring to kidnap Henry Kissinger, blow up the heating systems in Washington and raid draft files. As an Asian and a man of conscience, he has been compelled to consider American policy and acts in Indochina.

His visit to the Springfield area is part of a nationwide celebration in support of the "Conspirators for Peace". On Saturday, February 19, at 8 p.m. he will be speaking at "Off The Runway", a G.I. center located at the corner of Main and Cabot Streets in Holyoke.

On Sunday, February 20, at 9:30 a.m. he will be speaking at the Trinity United Methodist Church, 361 Sumner Avenue, Springfield. The public is invited.

Swiss Pianist To Perform Here

The prize-winning, young Swiss pianist Fernande Kaeser will give a piano recital at UMass where she is an assistant professor in the music department.

The concert will be Wednesday, Feb. 23, at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. As part of the University's Faculty Recital Series, the event is open to the public, free of charge.

Miss Kaeser, who gave her first concert when she was 10, started her musical studies at the age of seven at the Institut de Ribaupierre of Vevey. She has also studied under the late famous pianist Dinu Lipatti at the Conservatoire of Geneva, from which she graduated in 1949 with highest honors. Later she studied with Paolo Denza in Naples and Bruno Seidlhofer in Vienna.

In 1951, the gifted young pianist was the only prize winner for piano at the International Music Competition of Geneva. Three years later, she was awarded, by unanimous decision, the first prize at the International Music Competition of Munich, becoming the only Swiss pianist ever to have won this prize.

Fernande Kaeser has performed widely in Europe, making two national concert tours for the Jeunesses Musicales of Switzerland, and performing in concert and on radio with the greatest European orchestras, such as the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande and the London Philharmonic Orchestra.

On the program for the Feb. 23 recital are works by Galuppi, Beethoven, Schubert, Mozart, and DeBussy.

Fellowship Awarded Here

A $5000 fellowship to develop synthetic polymers for purification of water has been presented to the UMass department of chemical engineering by the Diamond Shamrock Corp. of Cleveland.

The chemical engineering department will use the grant to study the preparation and evaluation of new membranes from synthetic polymers to be used for the purification and recycling of waste water in municipalities and industry. The research will be directed by Prof. Robert W. Lenz.

Diamond Shamrock is a diversified producer of chemicals, oil and gas, and minerals. It is one of the 250 largest industrial companies in the nation, with sales in excess of $550 million.

It has a broad program for support of higher education, which includes financial aid for capital fund programs, undergraduate scholarships, full graduate fellowships, and partial summer fellowships, and a Gift Matching Program for employee gifts to colleges and universities.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

The classical Virgo wants to be of service--can help those in trouble and can know what is good or otherwise where health is concerned. Virgo can also be neat to the point of exasperation. A reader named Janet writes from Chicago to complain that her Virgo mother is so neat that "she even puts paper under the cuckoo clock."

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Public reaction to your efforts is sudden and intense. Not so good now for partnerships--marriage and other important relationships subject to change. Maintain equilibrium. Keep sight of goal.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Deal with elements, persons that cause you to feel confined. Break free: express yourself. Communicate. Teach and learn. Cooperate in project that gets you inside and on ground floor. You will comprehend.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Strive to reach understanding at home. You will need moral support. Quick changes occur. There is much speculation, but not so much in way of factual information. Hold off on long-range commitment.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): What appeared settled may be due for somewhat of an upheaval. Many of your views change. Basic concepts could undergo transformation. Pisces is involved. Be aware of property values. Get appraisal.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Steer clear of one who is erratic driver. You are likely to be on the move. Carelessness now can result in accident. Stick to proved methods, familiar paths. Gain shown if you adhere to conservative course.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Don't hang on to losing proposition. You are not committed to bear another's burden--or loss. Emerge from emotional cocoon. You have a life of your own to live. Get rid of foolish fear.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Circumstances seem to take over. Key now is to make your own way. Revere your individuality. Don't follow crowd. Various complications will unravel. One close to you actually does want to understand.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You make discovery which can result in future gain. Realize you have something of worth. Don't sell short. You don't have all necessary information. Be wary about confiding to friend. Discretion is important.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Friends act in unorthodox manner. It doesn't pay now to heed one who is impulsive. You may be attracted, but this could be very temporary. Meaning will come across. Opposite sex is involved. Emotions strive to dominate.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Invest in your own beliefs. Crystallize ideas. Take a chance on abilities. Stick to what you know, despite temptation to do otherwise. Study Sagittarius message. Emotional logjam will be released.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Not favorable for travel. More planning is required. Change is necessary, but it need not be abrupt. Base actions on facts, not fantasies. Look ahead to foreseeable opportunity. Realize that further analysis is needed.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Financial affairs are activated. Family responsibility is emphasized. Question of loans and payments are likely to arise. Remove mystery clouds. Get to heart of matter. Frank discussion should be advocated. IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY your humanitarian instincts are outstanding. At times, however, you feel you know what is best and insist on doing things your own way. Mostly, you are right. Always, it could be said, your motives are noble. Upcoming months may find you caught up in social whirl. The month of May could be most significant.

Gymnasts Face Navy In Home Finale

By JANE CROOK

The UMass Varsity Gymnastics team will make their last home appearance of the 1971-72 season tomorrow afternoon in the Boyden Auxiliary Gym when they host Navy, in a meet slated to get underway at 2 p.m. UMass, currently sporting a 5-2 record, is looking for a big win, following a feeble, although winning, performance over Syracuse last weekend.

As was anticipated, as in all "easy meets, the team was not as sharp as they were against Springfield. Saturday will have to be a different story. Coach Bill Savering's Midshipmen, now 2-3 in Eastern League Competition, have been improving steadily all season, and could prove to be a serious challenge for the Redmen.

Although we defeated Navy by a 153.25-148.00 score last year, a much closer meet is anticipated tomorrow afternoon. This team, the best one Navy has had in years, is capable of scoring in the 154-155 range. This means everyone is going to have to come through for UMass if we are to emerge unscathed, with another win to carry to Temple.

Leading UMass on Saturday will be senior co-captains Ton Vacca and Dave Genest. Both gymnasts are seasoned competitors and E.I.G.L. medalists. Shoulders willing, Vacca will pace the Redmen in the all-around event, with Steve Scuderi and Rich Seikunas supplying the added depth. UMass will go basically with the same specialist line-up that scored 155 at Springfield. Coach Kjeldsen will be relying on strong routines from John Calabria and Jack Berner on floor, Lenny Aubrey and Steve Nelson on sidehorse, Jay Aronstein and John Oliver and Tom Myslicki on high bar, all of whom were outstanding in the close Springfield meet.

Vital scores for the Redmen will come from Vacca, who despite a hampering shoulder injury, had strong performances on the floor, vaulting, and horizontal bar at Springfield, and from Scuderi who won the all-around there and a first on high bar. Coming off of a promising performance at Syracuse, Lenny Aubrey will be an integral part of the all-important sidehorse score.

Event for event, sidehorse and vaulting look to be decisive. Navy boasts a dynamite sidehorse duo, the best in the East, possibly the country. Swanson and Worthington have scored around 9.4-9.5 in competition this year. Floor Exercise will be a toss-up, but UMass should win rings, giving us a slight advantage at intermission.

The second half will be really tight. The teams are very evenly matched on parallel bars and high bar, making the outcome impossible to predict. The home court and crowd should give the Redmen an edge.

Hopefully the team is on its way out of an injury and illness slump, and will get it all together on Saturday. It'll be a close one!

Is The World Hockey Association For Real?

By STEVE TRIPOLI

Last Monday the newly formed World Hockey Association held its first player draft, drafting not only some promising young amateur talent but also many of the National Hockey League's greatest stars. This somewhat bizarre situation immediately brings the following question to the minds of many hockey fans: Can the WHA really expect to successfully pull such a move off?

There are of course those among us whose first reaction to such an idea would be to laugh, except somehow we can't forget that there once was an organization called the American Football League which was the source of much derisive laughter as late as five year ago.

But there are a few obvious differences between the AFL of old and the WHA of today. While the WHA has been purportedly dangling some huge amounts of cash in front of a few of the "name" players of the National Hockey League, it is doubtful that they possess the kind of money that the original AFL owners had.

Furthermore, the AFL (this also applies to a similar situation facing the ABA) was smart enough not to tangle with the far and away more powerful NFL when the new league began, even if it meant the indignity of playing their games in such places as the old Polo Grounds in New York City (the original home of the present New York Jets).

In this somewhat humble manner the AFL managed to avoid the early death that would surely have been theirs had they decided to tangle with established power. While everyone was laughing, the front office people of the league quietly molded a legitimate football force which stummed the sports world one day in early January 1968 when the New York Jets took on the "invincible" Baltimore Colts in Super Bowl III.

But the WHA has decided to challenge the big money from the word go. This course of action will inevitably lead to its death. This is not to say that the almighty power of the NHL should not be challenged, but the fact of the matter is that like it or not it is the power to reckon with in the hockey world, and the WHA has chosen to reckon with this power in a self-annihilating way.

Instead of wasting its time drafting big name NHL stars, few of which will even seriously consider the offer, the WHA should be concentrating on getting some good young talent into the fold. In this manner they might be able in a few years to pull the kind of surprise that the AFL pulled off in Super Bowl III. As things stand now, the WHA is chasing pie in the sky and their inane and unrealistic policy is going to net them very scanty returns.

So the WHA starts out with a double edged disadvantage. They are challenging a power that is too big for them and they are blowing the chance to get some good talent by reaching for unrealistic goals.

Add the two together and it's not hard to see that by trying to gain too much too fast the WHA will end up with nothing at all.

Women's B-Team Gymnasts Win

By STEVE CARY

In the tri-gymnastics meet held Wednesday, our women's B-team, the gymnasts' equivalent of junior varsity, found themselves on a higher level of competition than either Salem State College or the University of Connecticut. The respective team scores of 76.35, 51.25, and 50.25 clearly indicate a "meet within a meet" between Salem and UConn, but in view of superior performances from UMass, it was an interesting contest at best. Women's training coach Virginia Evans is now primarily concerned with the ten more points our B-team will have to find to comfortably compete in approaching events.

It is notable that of the possible twelve top places, that is the highest three scores in the four events (floor exercise, sidehorse vaulting, balance beam, and uneven bars), UMass took ten. Beginning with floor ex., Thanne Poth's finely styled execution won easily at 7.55, with Candy Gross second at 7.3, and Marion Kulick third, with a possibly over-exhuberant 7.05. Side horse vaulting was won by Judy Cardozo with a 7.05, and then came Salem State second and third with D'Augustino at 5.5 and Casper at 5.35. Balance beam, the event which demands the most concentration for success, was won by the surprise performance of Diane Metzler with 6.45, who was followed by Judy Cardozo at 6.05, with Candy Gross and Marion Kulick tying at 5.8. Finally, unevens closed the evening with the best routine of the meet performed by Thanne Path at 7.6, followed by injured teammate Heidi Armstrong at 6.0, with Judy Cardozo in third at 5.4.

Although out of ten possible points these scores seem low, they must be judged in accordance with the level of gymnastics these performers have achieved. B-team work is an important part of a gymnast's career and taken as seriously as the higher levels by the concerned performer. This team's line-up will certainly be improving and contributing positively to this university's gymnastics.

Runners Vie For Title

By MDC STAFF

Tomorrow the UMass trackmen seek to dethrone the defending indoor champion Huskies of UConn in the Conference Championships at Orono, Maine. This year's meet should be the best balanced competition held in recent years. With the addition of Boston University and Holy Cross as well as the upgraded program at the University of Maine the perenial powers, UMass and UConn should receive a stiff challenge for the team title.

DOUG O'CONNELL AND MIKE MCLUSHER will run the 2 mile in the YanCon while Bill Gillin (third in line) will run the mile. Photo by Tom Derderian who sat that race out but will run the 2 mile tomorrow also.

"Maine could be considered the darkhorse" relates Coach Ken O'Brien. Five years ago, at Maine they surprised everyone and easily won the championship. This year the Black Bears have a new tartan track in their spacious field house and the Maine trackmen have responded with quality performances. With the fine competition and one of the best indoor field houses in New England, nearly every meet record is in jeopardy.

"I would think it will take fifty points to win the meet and we have the strength to do it," continued O'Brien. "It will be a tough test physically for a young team but I'm more aware of the mental pressures on a team that has 17 out of 30 people who have never been to a conference championship meet. We should trail by a large point spread early, due to the order of events and our strengths and weaknesses. We are aware of this and we'll keep our poise so that it doesn't affect our performances in our strong point scoring events. We know that as the meet progresses we will be scoring at a faster rate than anyone else. We could score ten points in the last event alone and we want to do all we can early to make these points count."

Among the point scoring potential, the Redmen possess a talented array of sprinters and hurdlers.

"Tony Pendleton, Dennis Busa, Ed Haywood and Ron Harris are all veterans of conference competition and its great to have experience in the sprints where one mistake can be disastrous. Jim Groves is another veteran and the top hurdler in New England."

The distance men already conference champions in cross country, have proven their ability and only have to do it one more time. Junior Rich Barry and freshman Randy Thomas have no conference experience but have proven that they are great competitors against tough Ivy League opponents.

Doug O'Connell, Mike McLusher, Bill Geller and Tom Derderian are all potential place winners in the two mile and run very well together in the big meets.

Steve Levine and Steve Cuminan look for fast times in the 600, and face New England champion Rich Comeau from Holy Cross who must be a decided favorite. Levine and Cuminan join Graves and freshman Tom Beland in the mile relay that will surprise a lot of opponents since they have not yet run as a team.

The 1000 yard run now finds seven men within a second of each other in the rankings. Al Mangan is a senior; placing in the conference 880 for two years. Arnold Muse and John Maloney have placed in the conference middle distance events in the past two years and together with milers Rich Barry and Randy Thomas will form a two mile relay event that will be the final event of the afternoon.

"We could surprise in the jumping events," said O'Brien.

Ed Shaughnessy, Steve Bradley and Mike Geroghty have been narrowly missing on long jumps that will place them this week. Shaughnessy and freshman Mark Hughes have looked bery good in the high jump, an event where 4 inches separates 10 competitors.

Skaters Busy

The UMass Redmen hockey team will be hosting a pair of Maine colleges as their opponents in this weekend's hockey action.

Colby College will face-off against the Redmen at Orr Rink tonight at 7:30, and a very strong Bowdoin College sextet will be here for an afternoon game tomorrow at 3:00.

The Colby club hasn't played any of its games out of Division II thus far in the season, and have compiled a record of 8-8-1. In their first meeting, UMass swamped Colby by a score of 6-1, but that showing by Colby can not be considered significant in relation to tonight's match. It was only their second game of the season while the Redmen had already had seven games under their belts. And

THE LAST L.. .E of defense is the goalkeeper and UMass has a great one in P.J. Flaherty. The Redmen face a big weekend with three games in four nights and the senior goaltender is going to be a busy man. (MDC photo by Pete Manera)

Colby's first game was three weeks previous to the UMass game. So, the Redmen tonight will be playing a considerably better team than the one they met way back in December.

The Bowdoin College Polar Bears don't want anything more than a big victory over UMass tomorrow. Now that it has been announced that Bowdoin apparently won't be defending their Division II title because of the ECAC decision, the Polar Bears will be out to prove their championship status.

Along with Vermont and UMass, Bowdoin has only one loss in Division II play, and would still have an excellent chance to take the top seed in the race.

The New England Small College Athletic Conference, which is composed of Bowdoin, Colby, Amherst, Hamilton, Middlebury, and Williams, contends that because of the amount of travelling that would be necessary in the eight-team playoff system, participation would be too much of a burden on studies.

Coach Canniff gives this example, "If Bowdoin should fail to draw a bye for the first game, it would be conceivable that they would have to travel to Buffalo on the first Saturday, and then possibly to Oswego, N.Y. for the second game on Wednesday, and then to somewhere else on the next Saturday. Three long trips in one week could be too much."

This is the feeling of the NDSCAC presidents, but Coach Canniff believes that there is still a very strong possibility that Bowdoin will be in the playoffs, perhaps due to student pressure at the college. Either way, Bowdoin's going to be flying high tomorrow.

The Redmen will be coming off a strong performance on Wednesday night when they were edged by UNH in overtime.

By the way, if for some reason you can't make it down to Orr Rink for Saturday's game, it will be televised by the educational network on Channel 57.

Hoopsters Host URI

By EARLE BARROLL

Rhode Island basketball has been nothing less than an out and out bummer this season. According to pre-season basketball magazines they were given their pick of post season tournaments on a silver platter, they were given the Yankee Conference title by default of the others and they were given the New England title with little more than a token struggle.

But some twenty games later, the Rams are a struggling ball club with only one goal in mind, that being to capture the Yankee Conference title and try to save a minute portion of the face they have already lost.

Tomorrow at 2 p.m., that's right 2 p.m., these same Rams will be at Curry Hicks Cage to battle the Redmen for the lead in the Yankee Conference...both teams are 4-1.

URI coach Tom Carmody is big on transfers and this season he went all out and imported the finest ones around in Don Blackman from Duke, Tom Barao from Wisconsin, Tom Leone from Tennessee and Robbie Young from the junior college ranks.

But as coach Ray Wilson of UMass has pointed out, "You can't expect to bring in material from other schools and have a closely put together team right off the bat."

This has indeed been the problem for Rhody this season. Too many one-man shows, too much selfishness and in the main too much inconsistency.

Right now URI is struggling just over the .500 mark but is coming off a big upset over Providence and this shows just what type of team it is when it can ship the Friars and a team like Duquesne (20th ranked at the time) and then come back and play poorly against Boston College, Richmond and lose to Maine at Orono.

There is no doubt that they will pose a serious threat to UMass. Their size alone is awesome, 6'8, 6'9,6'6 up front and 6'3, 6'4 in the backcourt. The best two players come right from the Rhody system in Steve Rowell at forward and Phil Hickson at guard. The other starters will be Blackman, Young and Barao.

UMass will have to run against this team. Without the big guys of past, this year's team has been at a loss for rebounds and to negate this they will have to try to tire the big team down.

Rhode Island is really hard to compare to any team UMass has played this year. They're a big disappointment like Harvard. They're extremely big like B.U. or UConn, but there's something about those transfers that set it aside from the rest.

If they put it together, like on paper, they are man for man as good as there is in the east. But they haven't, it might take another year...Carmody is thinking of scrapping the transfer program for he has already died a thousand deaths during this season

UNH A "Hold" In Grapplers' Countdown

By JOHN BOCK

The countdown is on for the UMass wrestlers as the New England Intercollegiate Wrestling Association (NEIWA) Tournament is only eight days away. The countdown must be held, though, because of a match. The last one of the season and the one that should tell the Redmen what to expect of the last Yankee Conference team they must wrestle.

The Wildcats of New Hampshire are the eighth ranked team in the NEIWA poll and could be really up for the match. It is a long journey to Durham and the Wildcats are not any pushover team, as justified by the fact that they are on the toughest schedule in New England.

They offer Larry Woods at 167 pounds as the Captain and probably best competitor. Woods hails from Pittsburgh, Pa. and wrestled his high school days in one of the best wrestling areas in the country. The Redmen have Mike Duffy stepping onto the mat against him. Mike has an impressive wrestling pedigree, State Runner Up in New York and an excellent freshman record.

The rest of the New Hampshire team is primarily boys from the state and they have done a respectable job this season. They gave Dartmouth a run for the money before finally losing and did the same against Central Connecticut.

The team has had some harder than usual practices in preparation for the tournament. Some weight lifting has been added to the workouts to accompany the drilling and conditioning. The Redmen may exhibit signs of this added training device in much the same way as they did last year before the New Englands. They wrestled the Engineers from MIT and did not look impressive due to soreness. In fact the MIT coach came up to Coach Barr after the match and said "I think we could have beaten you." Such was not the case the following week, however, as the UMass grapplers did not lose one bout to a man from MIT.

A different lineup will be boarding the bus for Durham this Saturday. It will have at 118 pounds Barry Godowsky, who has wrestled most of the season at 126. Barry made the decision to godown for the New Englands in hopes that he will be closer to a title.In the spot that Barry has vacated will be Mike McGlaughlin who has seen most of his action at 134. Mike feels much better at 126 because the size and strength factors are a little more in his advantage.

At 134 the Redmen might have to give UNH six points for a forfeit because it is doubtful that anybody can make weight for this sport. A possibility is moving Dave Amato into the 126 berth and letting McGlaughlin go back to 134 for one more.

THE HASSLES OF A SUPERSTAR

Federalizing The Holyoke Range

By CYNTHIA F. NADREAU

"The waters... are remarkably pure and light... everywhere pure, potable... The beautiful river " - early 19th century.

The Reverend Timothy Dwight, President of Yale College, 1795, went on to enumerate the beauty of the hills, bluffs, and mountains. He wrote of the many towns, villages, and hamlets with their neat schoolhouses and lofty church spires, all of them "works of prosperity and improvement". Throughout the recorded history of New England, much has been written about the significance of the Connecticut River, of its importance to the Indian and to the Colonial settler, and to all those who have followed. One theme runs constantly throughout this history - the outstanding beauty of the valley.

In more recent times, equally descriptive observations have been made though not necessarily as favorable. One of those, a study called the Connecticut River National Recreation Area study in 1969, recognized the beauty of the river and the need to preserve the once peaceful setting.

"It took eons to build the beauty of the Connecticut River Valley. The slash of bulldozers can rapidly take it away. Only constant vigilance safeguards our natural heritage-only far sighted planning will make sure that future generations will enjoy the precious aspects we still retain today. We must act to safeguard the future."

—Senator Ribicoff, 1966

After collaboration between State and local officials, planning agencies, private organizations and others, and after factors relating to the present and future use of the Connecticut Valley were reviewed, including land use, geology, current and anticipated recreation participation, socioeconomic characteristics, water quality, and transportation, a bill was introduced to create a Recreation Park.

"For a region which now has no national park, I recommend the study of a Connecticut River National Recreation Area along New England's largest river in the states of New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut."

—President Johnson, 1966

The Overthrow: Part Four

Nick and I floated out of Kennedy Tower after making our visit with Franklin the Great (Vender of the Allusive canabis sativa). Scraps of the dialogue left behind in that infamous room were still sifting there way through my head.

"You've got to let the energy flow through your body, man. The energy from the Universe has got to flow easily. You've got to eat LSD." That was Franklin the Great and his methodology for living. "eat LSD", he continued, "bum out, blow your mind. 'Cause when your mind is bummed out and blown away, man, all the bad vibes and concentrations of bad energy get blown to pieces." He added as an afterthought: "Your mind comes back later, man, but it comes back in a completely new design. LSD is the key, eat it."

Now, Franklin is practically a vegetable. He's harmless as long as you don't buy any of his acid. Buy his dope though. It's second to none. I should add that Franklin is a bit touched in the prefrontal lobe when it comes to revolutionary causes. He was willing to give us fifty ounces for "the cause". When you figure that there are only about two hundred students in the English 125 program that gives each a quarter of an ounce. He also wanted to lead an attack on the Campus Center (calling it "that great barf-burger in the sky) but we ignored him and smoked a joint of the stuff he was going to give us.

We did literally float out of Kennedy after smoking one joint of Franklin's stuff. Both silently agreeing that it was some of the best shit we had ever smoked, we ricochetted into Nick's room in MacKimmie. I noticed the fog machine in the middle of the floor. Without saying a word, Nick turned it on. In about five seconds his tub-size single was filled with a white odorless smoke. The only thing we could see after ten seconds was the beams of light rays coming through the window. Any movement by us made the fog shift and everything quiver. after about a minute of this, Nick had enough presence of mind to bellow, "Let's get out of here!"

We bolted from the room with the fog maker. Once in normal atmosphere again we seemed to drop from the clouds. Making our way to F Lot, we put the machine in a big cardboard box in the back of Nick's old Ford Country Squire. We proceeded to the rear of Bartlett and made our way, box and all, to the second floor landing. There we stopped and shook hands, then pulled knitted ski masks over our faces (we got the idea from "Dirty Harry") and pulled the machine from hiding.

Bursting through the doors, Nick stood guard right there at the doors while I went into the main office for Undergraduate English. I filled the room full of smoke as Erma fainted. Then, running up and down the corridor, I filled very room that was open. There was no screaming, only an occasional grunt of astonishment. When I was done there was only silence.

Nick and I stood at opposite ends of the corridor surveying what we had accomplished. Professors started coming out of their offices. Bewildered and shocked they kept bumping into each other and falling over piles of last semester's final exams. All of a sudden the screaming started.

"The sky is falling, the sky is falling", bellowed Jonathan Quick making one of the few coherent statements from the babbling profs. The rest of the screaming was unintelligible with "Oh, rosy fingers of dawn" being a favorite among the English 125 professors. Ellsworth Barnard (we were lucky to catch the Ombudsman in his office!) ran up and down the hall waving his hands and shouting, "Suffer little children to come unto me". From the professors lying on the floor, there came mumbled words of Shakespeare, Faulkner, and LBJ.

For Nick and I, it was an emotional moment, this. This was victory. Nick went downstairs to pull the car around, eyes aglazed. I stayed to gloat some more. Without warning, like a fullback on the move, Erma came careening from her office and barreled up the corridor shouting, "I will not allow violence against this house". I didn't stick around knowing the import of those words and the consequences if she got a hold of me.

In the car, heading back to Southwest (the fog machine safe and snug in the back-back) Nick turned to me. "Boy, am I stoned." I couldn't believe he said that after what had just happened. I started laughing and couldn't stop. Nick joined in (straining to keep the car on the road). We turned the corner at F Lot, and, as the laughter in the car continued to rise, I thought to myself that anyone who saw the two of us now would easily recognize us for the deviates we were, and I laughed harder.

"Rip And Clout"

In the Fifties it was Big Time Wrestling and Haystack Calhoun and Gorgeous George had the highest Neilson Ratings of the day along with packing 13,909 in the Garden on every occasion. And in the Sixties sandwiched between your favorite by Leslie Gore and Chubby Checker came blasting SUNDAY, SUNDAY, SUNDAY AT BEAUTIFUL NEW ENGLAND DRAGWAY and the racing car fad peaked. Then rather innocuously towards the middle of the last decade a sport grew out of San Francisco and Joannie Weston skated into our lives.

Her sport, the bastard of professionals. came to Cage last Saturday night and Poor Richard's was there en masse braving skates in the face and arrogant skating superstars to cover this event. The results of the efforts are found in our centerfold where Kenny Sulin and Steve Ferber report and Messrs. Sulin and Lavrakas capture on film the essential moving image of Roller Derby.

Tales of Trick E. Dixon

From Portnoy's Complaint to Our Gang Philip Roth now makes the transition from psychopathology to absurd political satire that just does not make it. Gene Walz discusses just why Philip Roth had best stick to the autobiographical stuff and leave the biting satire to those who don' fool around with "tarbabies". It seems that Mr. Roth hath written in a rage and the total time spent writing this wee volume could have been better spent brushing his teeth. See why the tales of Trick E. Dixon and Company fail in their attempt to jar that great Nixon image and end up as a nonconstructive harangue.

Those with Restricted Diets

The following note was found in Weight Watchers Magazine: "Film cultists who go to see a particular picture 10 or 20 times are becoming more and more prevalent. One New York movie house shows a horror film called Night Of The Living Dead at a midnight showing every Saturday night and nearly the same crowd shows up every week." This dietary delight has finally made it to our area and Bob Nesti discusses the film on page 13. From all reports it's not the most aesthetic film ever made but it will assuredly frighten the daylights out of you. You're dared to go throw a rose on Emily Dickinson grave after seeing this one.

But, a majority of the people of the area felt that a recreation park would be too much of a development at the expense of natural beauty. Others were concerned that federal land aquisition would interfere with land owners' rights or that too much land would be preserved for aerthetic reasons while the community lacked recreational facilities. A Citizens Advisory Committee was appointed in 1970 to make suggestions to the National Park Service. In June of 1971, Senator Edward Kennedy introduced legislation which would achieve "as nearly as possible the delicate balance between preservation and recreation; between continued waste of natural resources and loss of tax revenue; between individual property rights and the greater community welfare." The plan stresses low-impact development using many of the historic features and facilities already existing on the Holyoke Range in Amherst and Hadley and on the Connecticut River in Hadley and South Hadley. The proposed Federal park would be a major determinant of future land use and development in the towns of Amherst, Belchertown, Hadley, Granby, and South Hadley.

The proposal, called "The Connecticut Historic Riverway," would include three sections. These are the "Gateway Unit" in Connecticut, the Mount "Holyoke Unit" in Massachusetts, and the "Coos Unit" in Vermont and New Hampshire. Specifically, the Mount Holyoke Unit consists of about 12,400 acres plus 750 acres of unzoned river waters. The area, under the proposed plan, has been divided into three zones: Public use and Development, Preservation and Conservation, and Private Use and Development.

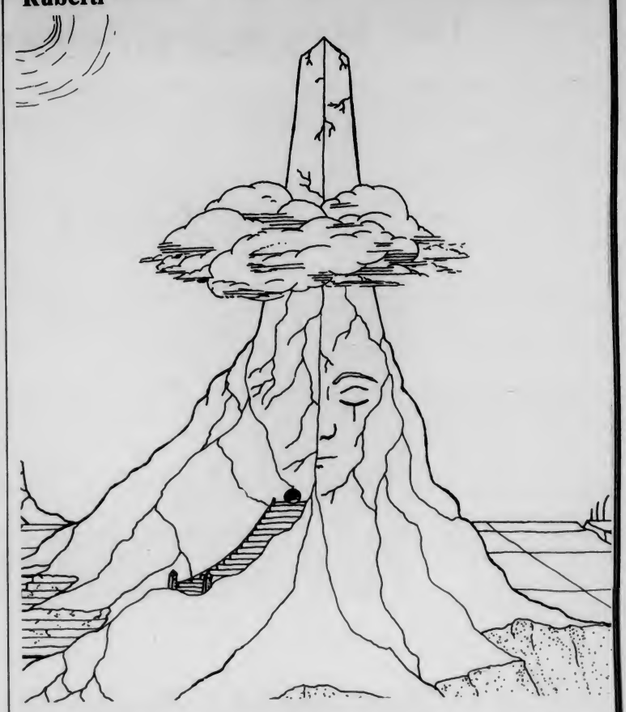
The Public Use and Development Zone would consist of about 1,100 acres and would be purchased outright by the Department of the Interior at fair market value, according to a report of the Mass. Citizens Advisory Committee. Most of this would be a buffer area surrounding the facilities located on about 300 of the acres. The visitors' center would be at Tinker Hill on the North side of the Holyoke Range. From here, visitors could ride or walk to a tram base and where they would be conveyed to the top of Mount Holyoke where there would be a scientific and historic interpretive facility, and a restaurant. Picnic sites and trails that now exist would continue. However, no cars will be allowed to ascend the mountain. Ecological and geological processes could be viewed by proposed river tours by boat to Rainbow Beach.

Winter sports, such as limited skiing, tobogganing, sledding, and skating, hiking, hunting and fishing, and even swimming would be provided for when anti-pollution measures make the river safe. "While it includes recreational facilities, it also preserves the most beautiful spots for the enjoyment of nature and the peace and solitude which it often brings", stated Senator Kennedy. "In the minds of some, 'recreation' means hordes of visitors in the summer months, noise, traffic jams, gaudy concessions selling over priced items, and rampant overdevelopment." Instead, this legislation outlines well-planned and coordinated recreational facilities designed to protect and maintain preservation of the area.

The Preservation and Conservation Zone, the bulk of the unit, will be maintained as it is. According to the Mass. Advisory Report, landowners could either keep their lands secured against future development by a legal easement appended to their deed titles, or they could require that the government buy all or part of the land outright at fair market value. Land secured against development by easement, together with existing structures and usages, could continue to be used today, be sold on the open market, or willed to heirs. The extension of trails for hiking, riding, bicycling, cross-country skiing are the only plans for development in this zone.

A future single-family housing development could occur in zone three, the Private Use and Development. However, any future commercial development would not be permitted. The rising costs of land anywhere in the north-east and its coversion into residential or commercial development is recognized as a factor for immediate action, stated Mrs. Janet Dakin, Amherst's Representative for the Mount Holyoke Unit.

The legislation also provides for the Mount Holyoke Riverway Advisory Committee composed of members representing the state government, regional planning commissions, towns and municipalities, and the Federal government. It establishes a clear and concise policy of cooperation between state and local agencies to provide safeguards against pollution of the Connecticut River.



The Conservation Action Committee at Mount Holyoke College has asked area residents interested in preserving the Mount Holyoke Range, to write their congressmen in support of the Mount Holyoke Unit of the Proposed Connecticut Historic Riverway.

In January of 1972, Mr. Dakin by appointment of the Amherst board of selectmen, was sent to Washington to act in support of the Mount Holyoke Unit. Along with her, John Olver, chairman of the Massachusetts Advisory Committee, attended the Washington Conference. Until the Connecticut and Massachusetts Units can be incorporated into a single proposal, the bill will not be considered by the Senate. Sen. Abraham Ribicoff's bill for Connecticut is substantially different from Sen. Kennedy's. Also, the resulting bill must be bi-partisanly sponsored by both states or no legislation will occur this year.

According to the master plan, several thousand people live and make their livelihood in the park area, which includes woodlands, farms, villages, residences and narrow country roads. "Unless the open areas within the park remain free of further residential, commercial, and industrial developments, they will no longer continue to serve as valuable open spaces for scenic and recreational enjoyment, and as natural and cultural amenities for public benefit.

The purpose of the park is to retain the appearance of the area as it now exists. The master plan proposes to facilitate this task with a minimum of disturbance to the present residential occupation. A major program will be carried out with visitors and local groups stressing environmental education and preservation of the cultural and environmental amenities of the park and surrounding area."

The Montague Plains Controversy

News Feature: Proposed landfill at Montague Plains

By JANE LOCKARD

The proposition to construct a sanitary landfill at Montague Plains has resulted in warm praise as well as harsh criticism from public and private sources. The report by Whitman and Howard, Inc., which was submitted to the DPW, claims that a landfill located at the Plains would not cause any detrimental effects to the environment. This report also states that strict surveillance would be maintained during the operation of the landfill in case any unexpected environmental hazards should appear.

The main source of informed criticism against the landfill is Dr. Ward S. Motts, a hydrogeologist at UMass. Dr. Motts belives that construction of the landfill would seriously threaten the quality of the Connecticut River, Lake Pleasant, Green Pond, the Fish Hatcheries, and the Montague Delta. The possible contamination of Lake Pleasant is of critical importance since public water supplies in the Montague area are obtained mainly from the lake.

State Rep. Thomas G. Simons and concerned citizens of the Montague area are requesting a complete investigation of the proposed landfill. They are asking that an independent study, by an agency other than the DPW, be conducted to examine discrepancies between the Whitman-Howard report and the report by Dr. Motts.

In the construction of a sanitary landfill, wastes are deposited in beds of uniform thickness and are covered each day with at least six inches of compressed fill. This covering is used to exclude rodents and to prevent odors and fires from spreading. The compressed fill is later increased to a thickness of at least two feet as the landfill reaches its capacity level. A primary advantage of the landfill method is that the filled area can be employed for recreational or industrial use.

"a landfill" more harm than good?

A bulletin issued in 1965 by the DPW Dept. of Sanitary Engineering confirms that the landfill method has the approval of State and Federal public health officials. This bulletin also recommends that the landfill be located close to the community which it will service in order to prevent long hauls of garbage. The Plains landfill would be stocked with garbage from Boston which does not comply with the above-mentioned recommendation.

The chief concern of Dr. Motts and his supporters is the possibility of seepage of contaminated matter into ground waters beneath the Plains. The possibility also exists that a considerable amount of water could flow over the top of the landfill deposit. Two preventive measures have been employed in the past to allay such dangers. One of these methods is to ensure the natural existence of clay and silt filtering beds. The other is the use of clay and plastic seals to prevent overflow and seepage. Dr. Motts points out, however, that the sealing method has been proven insufficient protection. In addition, the Montague Plains do not have the natural filtering beds to eliminate leachates.

It has been noted that all ground water under the Montague Plains eventually flow into the Connecticut River. Therefore any seepage of contaminants from the sanitary landfill will directly affect the pollution level of the river. Lake Pleasant and the Fish Hatcheries could also be detrimentally affected in a manner similar to that of the Connecticut River. Furthermore, the Montague Delta, a unique scenic feature of the Conn. Valley, would be eliminated.

Dr. Motts urges that careful consideration be given possible alternatives to the Montague Plains Project. He suggests the possibility of the use of high temperature incineration. Operating costs are about $7 a ton but can be reduced to about $3.50 a ton if the by-product of steam is sold for heating and power generation. In contrast, the cost in a sanitary landfill project is about $1-$3 a ton. However, the advantages of the incineration unit are relatively negligiable and the percent of combustion is greater than 99.5.

"The Complete Story Always Escapes"

by KAREN WALSH

A Sort of Life
Graham Greene

"Memory is like a long broken night. As I write, it is as though I am waking from sleep continually to grasp at an image which I hope may drag in its wake a whole intact dream, but the fragments remain fragments, the complete story always escapes."

Though fragments they may be, the bits and pieces assembled here by Graham Greene compose an immensely readable and interesting autobiography. The reader does not come away with the whole story, as Greene readily admits, but rather with insight into the personality of the author. It is more a character study than a chronological listing of events, interesting as much for the types of memories and incidents that Greene has chosen to include as it is for the actual progression of his life.

Greene does not include so mundane a thing as his birthdate, but a bit of observation and subtraction will fix it at 1904. His birthplace, Berkhamsted, England, and his parents, relations, houses and grounds are another matter, however - these are detailed with typical Greene description. His father was housemaster, later headmaster, of the Berkhamsted School, an aloof and intelligent man ("...we were regarded as the intellectual Greenes."). Graham eventually found himself in the uncomfortable position of son of the headmaster, dividing his loyalties between peers and authority and making his schooldays just that much more miserable. And miserable they were, enough to lead the thirteen-year-old boy to four half-hearted, but seriously intended, suicide attempts. Of the time, Greene writes: "I wondered all the way back to my hotel if I would ever have written a book if those years of humiliation had not given me a desire to prove that I was good at something...". It was during these years that he began what he calls his "lifelong war against boredom". Truancy became his way of life until, at age sixteen, he tried to run away and was summarily put into psychoanlysis. The following six months were "perhaps the happiest of my life", and he was sufficiently restored as to be able to return to school and go on to Oxford.

He had already begun to write, and at Oxford became the editor of the school paper, but the unrelenting boredom led him to secret attempts at Russian roulette for the very thrill of death's closeness, to excessive drinking ("For nearly one term I went to bed drunk every night and began drinking again immediately I woke."), and to a tangle with German-French espionage that gave him brief hopes of life as a double-agent. He became a member of the Communist party during a school vacation in Paris, with the wild hope of somehow winning a trip to Moscow and Leningrad. In the end, of course, he finished at Oxford, stumbled through a few unsuitable jobs and settled as an apprentice on the Nottingham Journal.

It was during this time that he began working on a novel, and, since he was engaged to a Catholic girl, began investigating the religion. "I had no intention of being received into the Church. For such a thing to happen I would need to be convinced of its truth and that was not even a remote possibility." He was baptized in 1926, in spite of himself, and the following month was accepted as a sub-editor of The Times. Had his third completed novel The Man Within not been published in 1928, Greene admits that he would have been happy working on The Times for the rest of his life. Still, his deepest desire was to be a writer, and the hint of success promised by publication resulted in his leaving the newspaper to devote himself to writing, a decision he was to regret. His following two novels were failures, his boredom returned, his debts mounted and only his desperation drove him on.

"If there are recurrent themes in my novels it is perhaps only because there have been recurrent themes in my life. Failure seemed then to be one of them". And it is on this note of failure that Greene has chosen to close his book, since he feels failure is "a kind of death". Again, he argues, success is always temporary for a writer, only a delayed failure. But Greene remains a highly successful writer, in spite of his beliefs to the contrary. It is almost ironic to read from the jacket of one of the editions of his The Power and the Glory: "Graham Greene's name is the best assurance there is of great reading and great fiction." Indeed, this autobiography illustrates the point. Greene's carefully controlled style, his observations, his almost unconscious perceptions into the events and forces which profoundly influenced his fiction, all bespeak a master. Especially impressive is the insight he has into himself as a writer. He mentions a time when he was hospitalized and chanced to witness the death of a young boy. All of the surrounding patients hid behind radio earphones to block out the cries of the mourning parents-all but Greene. "There is a splinter of ice in the heart of a writer. I watched and listened. This was something which one day I might need...." Further on, he writes: "A writer's knowledge of himself, realistic and unromantic, is like a store of energy on which he must draw for a lifetime." This book gives evidence both to Greene's deep knowledge of himself and to his ability as a writer; it is a fascinating record of a fascinating man.

Nixon As A Tarbaby

BY GENE WALZ

Our Gang (Starring Tricky and His Friends) by Philip Roth. 201 pp. New York: Random House. $5.95.

Several years ago during LBJ's lame-duck period Art Buchwald worried about what was going to happen to satire during Richard Millhouse Nixon's tenure in office. He was afraid that LBJ, a larger-than-life character whom people feared and who, therefore, was ideal grist for the satirist's mill, was giving way to a nameless, faceless crowd of unsatirizable politicos. Since then that incredible collection of goofs and gorgons with which Nixon has surrounded himself has provided more than enough material for the covey of satirists hovering around Washington. David Levine, Herblock, Jules Feiffer, David Frye, Buchwald and others have had a field day; there's more material now than they can use.

But what has happened is that things have reached a saturation point; what we now have is overkill. Nixon and company are so eminently satirizable that they have become unsatirizable. This can be termed the Tarbaby stage of satire. Like poor old Brer Rabbit in the Uncle Remus tale, the more the satirists clobber Nixon, the worse for them. Nixon doesn't suffer because of the ridicule anymore (if, indeed, he ever did); he just sort of sits there oozing pitch and waiting for unwary satirists to trap themselves by taking pokes at him.

Tarbaby-ism is probably the main thing that's wrong with Philip Roth's book Our Gang.

It's a book prompted by a Nixon speech: "From personal and religious beliefs I consider abortions an unacceptable form of population control. Furthermore, unrestricted abortion policies, or abortion on demand, I cannot square with my personal belief in the sanctity of human life - including the life of the yet unborn. For, surely, the unborn have rights also, recognized in law, recognized even in principles expounded by the United Nations." And it is dedicated to the proposition that all of Nixon was created evil. Our president, renamed Trick E. Dixon, is stupid, sentimental, hypocritical, cunning, political without principle (in other words, nothing we don't already know). In fact, because he has such a penchant for public self-revelation and always wishes to make things "perfectly clear," Tricky admits this in the last section of the book – when he's in hell campaigning for Satan's job: "To interject a personal note, you know I was born an opportunist, out in California, and during my years in public life I had the privilege of wheeling and dealing with other opportunists as well. And I think I speak for all opportunists when I say that Satan has been a constant source of inspiration to us from time immemorial, in good times and in bad. Surely I would want it understood throughout this campaign, that I respect not only the tenacity with which he lies, but his sincerity in lying. And, of course, I would hope that he would agree that I am just as sincere in my lying as he is in his."

All the way through Tricky is frantically trying to make sure that he isn't just a one-term president. That's why he makes that "unborn fetuses" speech – it's part of his plan to allow all unborn babies to vote – for him, of course. This, however, prompts the Boy Scouts to descend en masse on Washington to denounce Tricky as a sensualist in favor of sexual intercourse ("effing"). The president and his advisers don football uniforms and go underground to plan counterstrategy. They decide to concoct an elaborate conspiracy (rather than have Tricky confess to homosexuality) involving the five J's: Joan Baez, John Lancelot (Mayor of New York), Jimi Hendrix, Johnny Carson, and Jacqueline Charisma Colossus, plus the Berrigans, the Black Panthers, Hanoi, Jane Fonda, and Curt Flood.

Eventually they single out Flood and blame the Boy Scout uprising on his lawsuit against baseball and his emigration to the Pro-Pornography government of Denmark. But in a sneak helicopter raid of a Copenhagen Farm to capture Flood, the marines and the CIA end up seizing a black dog. Back in the U.S. Tricky enters a hospital to have the sweat glands removed from his upper lip so that the American people will trust him. In the hospital he is mysteriously assassinated – drowned in an oversized baggie. Everybody in America tries to confess to the murder to FBI director J. Edgar Heehaw, evangelist Billy Cupcake delivers the eulogy, and Tricky winds up in hell running for devil, bragging about how bad he was as president, and berating Satan for working for God in the Job incident.

I didn't laugh much when I read Our Gang – no guffaws, no chortles, no snickers, maybe a wry smile or two. (Dwight MacDonald claims he roared out loud – either 16 or 13 times, I've forgotten the number.) I just sort of flowed through it. Roth's inventiveness and cleverness in manipulating incidents and extending things to their absurdest points and drawing fantastic equivalents to real-life events intrigued me. But I wasn't overwhelmed by the book or even that fascinated by it. I just read along at a nice clip knowing that it would be over quickly (it's a short and fast look) plagued by that inveterate occupational disease called Bibliotermina (I can't Not finish a book I pick up).

In retrospect Our Gang seems funnier than it was going through it. Thinking back on the book makes it more amusing. There's a certain mind-numbing plausibility in everything which now impresses me and brings several scenes back to mind. Tricky's press conference statement, for instance: "But let me remind you, and all Americans, because this is a fact that seems somehow to have been overlooked in this whole debate: I am no Johnny-come-lately to the problem of the rights of the unborn. The simple fact of the matter, and it is in the record for all to see, is that I myself was once unborn, in the great state of California. Of course, you wouldn't always know this from what you see on television or read in the papers (Impish endearing smile) that some of you gentleman write for, but it happens nonetheless to be the truth. (Back to serious business) I was an unborn Quaker, as a matter of fact." His statement about the crippled Vietnam Vets is a classic: "Now it was one thing when those Vietnam soreheads came down here to the Capitol to turn their medals in. Everybody knew they were just a bunch of malcontents who had lost arms and legs and so on, and so had nothing better to do with their time than hobble around feeling sorry for themselves. Of course they couldn't be objective about the war – half of them were in wheelchairs because of it. But what we have now isn't just a mob of ingrates – these are the Boy Scouts!" His rationalization of the death of three of the demonstrators is another good example: "But let there be no mistake about it. quick on the trigger as I may be with compassion for the innocent families, I am equally swift in my condemnation of these three guilty Scouts. And I say 'guilty' because if they were not guilty they would not be dead. That is not the kind of country we live in."

One final noteworthy example is his explanation of the inhuman conditions of the preventative detention camp: "In all, what might have been a nightmare for the citizens of Chevy Chase, Maryland, was converted into a wonderful scouting experience for the boys themselves, and one that I'm sure they'll remember for a long time to come. I know that when the police vans returned this morning to take them away, many of the boys were reluctant to leave the campsite. So anxious were some to spend another night under the stars, and away from the so-called 'comforts' of civilization such as medical attention, lawyers, telephones and food, that it was necessary for the police to chase after them and literally drag them off the premises and into the waiting trucks. With fewer and fewer opportunities available to our youth for 'roughing it,' this administration naturally takes pride in what we were able to do these youngsters last night. Moreover, we have given them every assurance that if and when they ever come to Washington again, we will make every effort to provide them with the same facilities, or ones even more primitive, if we can find any."

There is a nice section in which the dunder-headed advisers (a spiritual, a political, a legal, and a military coach) propose poison gas as an alternative to guns and billy clubs – so as to prevent "bloodshed" – realize that gas would get everybody in D.C. and must find a way to transport the protestors out of town to be gassed. The general goes berserk at the thought of bussing to achieve the results. Spiro Agnew serves as an amusing leit motif – his alliterative diarrhea inserted periodically. But this is by now trite and is only redeemed by his final breakdown into nonsensical babbling a la Lewis Carroll: "If the creeps and the cowards that crucify the crelinion, crip after crip, and who furthermore – and we have proof of this – have crossbowed the cradalious ever since the first crackadoes crusaded in the cause of caliphony, if they think they can cajulate and castigate and get away with it, there will be such a cacophony of cabs, cassanings and crinoleum through the criss and cratch of this country, that the cryptocallistans and the quasi-clapperforms will quiver rather than coopt the crokes." And there is deliciously grim irony in a newscaster's report on the funeral of Tricky: "Reaped by the Grim Reaper before the reaping was due, he brings us together at last, as he promised he one day would do."

Spiro Agnew and this newscaster provide an indication of the type of humor and satire in Our Gang. It's a ephemeral and it's literary. If you're up on current events and get your kicks from seeing the English language abused, you'll like the book. Some reviewers have evidently complained that Roth's book is in bad taste and that the humor is sophomoric. My complaint is that the book is not tasteless enough. It's too intellectual. I kept waiting around for Roth to do something new, something big, something devastating. But it never happens. There is no really inspired madness, or zaniness, or malice, or obscenity. This is not really "moral outrage transformed into comic art" as Roth stated in an interview. It's rather a self-indulgent display on Roth's part – not an incisive satire. And Roth should know better. If you're gonna mess with the Tarbaby at all, you gotta burn him, or stone him from afar, or bomb him. Start taking pokes at him and all you'll get is tarred.

Take Two

We've Been Through

"...recap of this hour's biggest news, millions of Americans again discovered skin color had

By NATHANIEL W. HAYDEN

For those among you who missed it, here is a synopsis of what happened last week, in Part I. On July 4th, 1976, an eerie comet passed over the United States and Canada, causing a change in the skin color of Black Americans to white. As a precautionary measure, under an emergency internment act passed by Congress, all of the "nuevos blancos", as they were called, were to be "quarantined" in ghetto areas, to prevent the contamination of everyone else with some undisclosed enigmatic disease. Here's Part II:

"Everybody, please remain silent and in your seats".

"Man, what are we going to do about this shit."

"I don't believe it. This whole thing is like a nightmare."

"Gentlemen, gentlemen, please, we've got to get ourselves together. I'm damn glad we decided not to cancel this meeting when the skin change took place. And ..."

"We can't just sit around and do nothing. We've got to take some action, right now. The only way anybody's ever going to put me in any concentration camp is in a pine box. I say we should burn down this motherfucking country before it literally wipes us off the scene."

"Freddie, be sensible. We've got to get ourselves organized, right now, right here, if we want to survive. If we go out there trying to burn everything down, we're the one's who will end up getting burned."

"Have you all gone mad? What are you all so worried about? It makes sense for them to quarantine us for a while, just to be sure we haven't contracted some weird disease."

"Bull-shit. Man, I know you've got to be sick. They're getting ready to make our communities concentration camps and you're talking about playing it cool? You're pathetic."

"What can we do about it?"

"What do you mean what can we do? Who the hell are we? Think about it. All of us have the training to take care of business. Most of us have been in combat in Vietnam. And you're a cop aren't you?"

"No, I'm in the National Guard."

"But you've had some military training already, right?"

"Yes"

"Okay. And so has just about everybody else at this meeting."

"That's right."

"Gentlemen, ... Will you please quiet down. First, I'd like to introduce myself for those of you who came in late. I'm Vincent Miller, I'm a colonel in the U.S. Army. Due to the President's statement just a few minutes ago about his plans for our people, the "nuevos blancos," I think we should put aside the agenda we had distributed to all of you to get you to come to this meeting. Instead of recruiting more of our people for the police forces, armed forces and National Guard, I believe it's our duty to recruit men and women for the liberation struggle that we must engage in immediately. As far as I'm concerned, we have only two alternatives. We can either fight for liberation or just lay down and die. Now what I want to hear is suggestions as to which is the best way this can be handled. "Before you make your suggestion, please state your name, where you're from and your occupation."

"I have a suggestion."

"Yes, brother?"

"My name is Henry Cleaves, I'm from Baltimore and I'm a sergeant on the police force. I think we ought to burn down banks, corporation headquarters and railroads serving suburbs."

"You out of your mind? That'll give those goons an excuse to systematically execute our people. That's the kind of thing they hope we'll do. Experience should tell you that. Remember the riots in the '60's? I know in some ways they helped us, but on the other hand, think about all of the innocent people who died or lost their homes."

"I think we should consider every possibility."

"How about guerrilla warfare?"

"Bro, will you identify yourself please?"

"Barry Lucas, I'm a private in the Army and I live right here in New York. I suggest guerrilla warfare because that's how the Vietnamese were successful and also why Uncle Sam's having such a hard time in Bolivia today."

"Yeah, but what..."

"Will you identify yourself?"

"I think we're spending too much time identifying ourselves and not enough time making suggestions. I was about to ask what about our wives and children. How are we going to protect them and conduct guerrilla raids at the same time? The immediate problem is how we're going to prevent those idiots from making concentration camps out of our communities."

"You got any suggestions?"

"Yes. I think all of us should attempt to take over all of the arsenals in the country. Like, the policemen among us can seize their precinct houses, guys who are in the National Guard can take over the armories and those of us in the armed forces can take over missile bases and the like. I'm sure we could also slip people into the top security missile areas too."

"How can we get away with something like that? Won't they be watching us?"

"No, because they think we're the "good niggers". They think we'll all just meekly go along with their plans to institute a salient form of genocide, because we've always been so quiet in the past when they played games with the lives of our people."

"How can we coordinate activities?"

"We can deal with that later. Right now we've got to decide on a definite plan of action and I believe the one I just mentioned is the most sensible one. Why don't we vote on it?"

"Okay"

"Larry, what are you doing?"

"Pointing my gun at you."

"You gone psycho or something?"

"No I haven't Joe. I'm coming to my senses. We're taking over the precinct."

"What?"

"You heard me. Put your gun on the desk, real slow."

"We've been really good buddies. Why you doing this?"

"It would be just a matter of time before you would have asked me to give up my gun and quietly lock me up in my neighborhood. I wish it hadn't come to this."

"...There's the gun. How far do you think you'll be able to go with all of this? The Army will probably be through here soon."

"That's right. But we've got control of the Army now. Are you forgetting the fact that since the Army became all volunteer, blacks have become a majority in it?"

"Come off it. They wouldn't join any conspiracy like this."

"Conspiracy? This is a revolution, not a conspiracy."

"Larry, this is treason."

"Oh yeah? You better rethink that statement. If you stick to it, what you'll really be saying is that the American Revolution was led by traitors."

"That was different."

"How?"

"... You really believe you're going to get away with this"

"Of course. We have no choice. We can either take over or get wiped off the scene."

"... Where's everybody else?"

"The same place you're going. Let's take a ride over to the detention hall."

"Good afternoon Al. Who are all of these guys?"

"Gentlemen, this is Morris Maxwell. Morris, this is Lieutenant Claude Brooks from the 27th precinct police headquarters and Sgt. Fred Simmons, also from ..."

"What happened? Why are you here?"

"They've come to give you some news."

"Why? We get all of the news from the teletype and reporters."

"They have something really special to tell you. Gentlemen?"

"You will no longer be the anchorman, Mr. Vann here will take over that responsibility."

"You can't be serious. Didn't you hear President Russworm's statement night before last quarantining all "nouveaux blancs?"

"That's why you will no longer be able to report the news Mr. Maxwell. We'll have to take you down to the station."

"Hey, what is this?"

"We're taking over, it's as simple as that."

"Stop trying to insult my intelligence. You couldn't have."

"Listen Maxwell, we've got to round up a lot of other people. We don't have the time to stand here and explain something to you that should be obvious."

"This is a nightmare. This is a nightmare. Things like this don't happen in the United States."

"Morris, I'm surprised. As a reporter you more than anyone else should know by now that any and everything can and does happen in the United States. Isn't that what you used to say? This is merely the realization of the American Dream; anybody can do anything in America."

"I refuse to believe this."

"Mr. Brooks, I guess you have no choice. If he refuses to cope with reality you'll have to take him to a mental hospital."

"Guess so."

"On the news tonight I'll have to let the public know the truth. Mr. Maxwell just couldn't take it any more and had to be committed."

"Do what you believe is best."

"Okay. When do all of their guns have to be in?"

"Tomorrow afternoon. If we find any of them with one after 4 P.M. tomorrow, they'll face a thirty year prison sentence."

"Don't forget that you're not supposed to tell them about the new government and the rest of it until we have all of the guns. We'll call you at about five tomorrow."

"... And now the news with Al Vann."

"Good evening. By executive order today the President declared from 7 P.M. tonight until 4 P.M. tomorrow "Firearms Impoundment Period." This action is being taken, according to Secretary of the Interior Jack Stevenson, because of the high number of accidental deaths, homicides and slaughter of rare animals and birds that result from the easy availability of firearms. There will be an extremely high penalty if anyone is found in possession of firearms after tomorrow afternoon.

The President also announced that he has cancelled Executive Order 7785 which had authorized the quarantine of all "nuevos blancos" because he says there is no proof that the "nuevos blancos" may contaminate anyone. He said there is no need for alarm.

I regret to report that our anchorman, Morris Maxwell, has been taken to a sanitarium due to his inability to cope with reality. Unfortunately, it looks as if we will be there for quite a while. I'll be back with more news after this word from "Groove".

"Are you joking?"

"No I'm not. And the President's name is Raymond Henning."

"That's such a fantastic story. When are you going to tell the public?"

"Tomorrow, after all guns have been confiscated."

"Are they going to try to seek revenge for the injustices of the past?"

"I have no idea. Except they carted Morris Maxwell off to a mental institution because he refused to believe that they were taking over."

"Things have changed so quickly."

"It's hard to absorb it all."

"... Oh. One thing I forgot to tell you is that they're also going to seize the old white's bank accounts and redistribute the money "equitably."

"Even the millionaires?"

"Especially the millionaires."

"I find it hard to believe that they're going to develop a socialist state. There's always going to be somebody on top and somebody on the bottom."

"You're right. But what they're going to do is bring those extremes closer together. In other words, they intend to make it so that the difference between the poor and the rich will be negligible."

"No, it sounds like just another wild dream."

"At one time if anyone had said we would eventually take over this country people would've said he was living in a fantasy."

"Yeah, but look at the changes we had to go through before it became possible."

"Sara, it was just a matter of time before this had to happen. The fact that we turned white helped it a little that's all."

"How will all of this affect us and the kids, since by all criteria, we've already, in quotes, made it into the middle class."

"We will of course be part of the upper echelon in this new social order."

"Somehow it seems as if nothing has really changed at all."

"Just wait and see what develops, okay?"

"I'm proud to present our Acting President, Raymond Henning."

"Salaam. I would like to announce at this time the existence of a new America. The United States shall henceforth be known as the Republic of Liberated America. Within the past few days we, the nouveaux blancos, depending on your preferences, liberated this decrepit nation and are in the process of rebuilding it.

At this time I will announce a few of the fundamental changes we are instituting. You will get a complete listing of all changes in your local papers tomorrow morning.

First of all, we're going to collect some dues. We intend to redistribute all capital within the next few days.

We're going to ship approximately 15,000,000 of you "old whites" to those quarantine compounds you intended to lock neuvos blancos up in.

We're going to make it illegal for any old whites to attend school.

We're going to brand all of you with the word "devil".

"We're going to have a dual legal system. Whenever one of you devils is arrested, you'll be considered guilty until proven innocent.

You will be required to wear only coarse clothing that has the word devil stitched into it.

These are only a few of the goodies in store for you people. All of these changes are going to begin tomorrow morning. There's no use trying to run. All of your areas are being carefully watched. It'll be very unhealthy for any of you to go out tonight at all."

"O vay, first the camps, now this. We got to get up the money to go to Israel."

"How can we? They're going to seize everybody's bank account."

"Don't you think they'll make any exceptions? I mean won't they care at all about the fact that we've never oppressed them?"

"Sylvia, they're not going to put everybody in a camp, just fifteen million."

"Since when can you say just fifteen million? You forgetting about Auschwitz, Buchenwald, Dachau, ..."

"I know. One is too many. But we've got to be realistic...

We've got to hold onto our sanity."

"Yeah I can see you grimly hanging on to your sanity while they're dragging you to a camp. We can't let that happen again. We've got to get organized and fight any way we possibly can."

"They've got the guns. They've got the ammunition."

"Suppose we try to go up to Canada tonight?"

"How are we going to do that when they've got armed guards watching the neighborhood?"

"Are you sure they do?"

"Positive. I saw a couple of troopers with machine guns standing on Central Avenue when I was getting off the train."

"There's gotta be something we can do."

"We can pray."

"Pray for what John?"

"Pray for a miracle, unless you have something better in mind."

"I don't feel in the mood for praying right now."

"Let's go to bed instead then."

"Is that an invitation?"

"What do you think?"

"Well, well, well. It's been a long time since ... "

"Enough".

"... This is too much, carrying me and all. You're acting as if this'll be the last time you'll be able to do it."

"With the world changing as quickly as it is, who knows, it just might be. Let's make it memorable."

"Hey move a little so I can get up."

"Aw come on, stay here."

"I told ya I got to be in early today."

"Why? The world's coming to an end and the only thing you can think of is going to work."

"We've still gotta live."

"Okay, okay. Want some eggs?"

"Naw. I'll just grab some orange juice."

"Oh yeah? I've got something right here you can grab right now. Satisfaction guaranteed."

"Naw."

"Turn around. Come on, turn around and give me a kiss at least, or was I too much for you last night?"

"... Sylvia. Oy... I don't know how to tell ..."

"Whaaaat?"

"... You're black...and so am I".

"Come on. I've heard of jokes..."

"Look in the mirror."

"No, no, no. ... Why? And look at this ... hair. It's so ... crinkly"

"And I used to think the Twilight Zone was something. This is a grim fairy tale."

"... And look at my nose. I didn't like it when it was crooked but it looks sick flat and wide."

"We've got to cope with this rationally."

"Okay genius, what's the rational explanation for all of this shit?"

"Our bodies probably had a delayed reaction to that comet. That's what it is."

"Is it just us or was everybody affected?"

"How the hell should I ..."

"Turn on the radio and find out."

"... recap of this hour's biggest news, millions of Americans once again discovered upon awakening that their skin color had changed. Due to the experiences of us "neuvos blancos" a few days ago, the reactions were easily predictable. Some folks had to be carted off to the looney bin because , to quote the vernacular, they "got totally freaked out". Some folks really think it's cool, and many others ask the unanswerable question, "Why me?". Of course, none of these reactions means much of anything. What really counts is what Brother Henning and his liberation forces think of it. Let me just say this for myself. I think it's really hip the way you counterfeit niggers have slid into your nigger duties. It was nice of you to make yourselves black to make it seem more natural. But if it were up to me, I'd say that ain't enough. I'd say you'll have to go through a lot more changes before we'll consider you cured of your oppressive nature. Besides that .. What? .. Right now?" In just a second Brother Henning will have a few words to say about you, ah ... nouveaux noirs or counterfeit niggers". Before he starts, I'm going to make it crystal clear to ... what's that? Okay. Here's brother Henning. He's also on the tube if you want to see the man."

"... only a few brief statements. First, no one will be placed in a relocation center. Second, no one will be forced to move to a ghetto home. Third, blacks will have equal rights to everything.

Fourth, my office will be very involved in solving our basic problems; poverty, illiteracy, crime, environmental pollution, and major diseases. If after three years of my term in office you are dissatisfied with my accomplishments or lack of them, I will step down.

Fifth, we would be the worst hypocrites of all time if we were to degrade you as much as you have degraded us. Vaya con Dios, Go with God.

"Al-bert".

"Wha-aat?"

"Come here dear."

"It's only six, I've got another half hour to sleep, what is it?"

"Take a look in the mirror."

"WE'RE BLACK AGAIN."

"YES WE ARE".

"Damn. A week ago we became white. Two days ago whites became black and TODAY WE'RE BLACK AGAIN".

"I don't know what it was, but I'm happy it's all over. I didn't particularly like getting up each day and shocking the hell out of myself whenever I looked in the mirror."

"What did you learn from the experience though?"

"I don't want to moralize. I'll leave that up to the historians."

"Well, do you really think our government will change the priorities the government has had so far?"

"I think Henning is a good guy, basically. I think there is a better possibility for tranquility to exist in America now that everybody is black."

"Don't forget. Within ten days of your child's tenth birthday, he must have in his possession a Citizens Worth Grade Card. Otherwise, he or she will automatically be placed in CWG 5."

"Come on Bobby, we've got to get you one of those cards."

"What does it mean, mom?"

"Well, ... look, read this:

Dear Parents:

Your son (daughter) Bobby will be ten years of age as of July 30, 1976. It is extremely important that you register your child because his position in society will be determined by it. Your child should be taken to the Citizen Worth Testing Center on Concord Avenue in order to be given the the mental and physical tests necessary to determine his fitness for meaningful involvement in society.

Here is a list of the grades and what they mean:

CWG — Citizens Worth Grade

CWG 1 - Your child has the capability to become an attorney, physician, scientist, psychologist or become engaged in a managerial position in business, the government, etc.

CWG 2 - Your child has the capability to become a teacher (high school or college), writer, or become engaged in a low managerial position in business the government, etc.

CWG 3 - Your child has the capability to become an elementary school teacher, clerical worker or other office worker Your child can also become a policeman or fireman.

CWG 4 - Your child will only be capable of doing menial work such as that done by a janitor or laborer.

"Rip And Clout, Rip And Clout, Tear His Goddam Eyeballs Out"

The Bastard Of The Pros

By STEVE FERBER

"Good everning ladies and gentlemen and welcome to Bowker Auditorium" would have been the more proper introduction to last Saturday night' fiasco at Curry Hicks Cage. Roller Derby, not Redmen basketball, held center stage, and for most of the 2500 on-lookers, it was a night full of vicarious thrills.

Most, if not all of the Winter Carni audience, had never seen a live Roller Derby contest, but by 10:30 that night, those who managed to stay had had more than a dose of the non-sport sport.

After waiting nearly 45 minutes, "Our Chiefs" took the stage, and as they warmed up the people who had asked, "What the hell is Roller Derby" were getting the idea. All those saying, "I wonder if it's as violent as on TV" were quickly finding out that it was.

All tha violence, the punching and kicking, and stomping and shoving, the the dubious action

throwing and belting and jumping and kneeing, all made the game seem like on big fight; and through it all no one seemingly got injured. Mighty strange, wouldn't you say?

Yes, that was the oddity, no one really got hurt. People were getting knocked on their ass, seemingly writhing in pain, then bang, there they were, some miracle drug on the bench had revived them and they were skating around like mad, minutes later.

Not to say that the whole Roller Derby match appeared to be a fraud. Why in the first 48 minutes one couldn't help but think that the animosity was for real. The action lent itself towards fighting and both the Chiefs and the Jolters made sure the crowd was aware of that.

The fact that skaters were racing around at high speeds, coupled with the understanding that they object was to stop others from passing you, made all the fighting rather realistic; but by the middle of half number two, the scenes started to lose a little something, nd the whole plot seemed to fall into place.

The plot went something like this: propagandize the crowd by telling them that the Chiegs were "Our" Chiefs. God knows why the Chiefs were ours, what did we do to deserve them? Were they the New England Chiefs, was Curry Hicks Cage perhaps their home areana to which they were returning after a 10 year absense, having been on a country-wide tour? Who knows, but the Chiefs were ours, so the least the Curry Hicks crowd could do was root for them,

Just to press a point, the colors on the rink's guard rail matched the colorful yellow and green outfits of "Our Chiefs." And in case anyone in the Cage still didn't know who to root for, the announcers added a little extra, though the use of some slanty commentary.

Yes, audience participation was a key consideration in this "production." The blue-uniformed Jolters, the multicolored Chiefs, the programs the book, the announcers, all intended to get the audience into the act. They did quite a good job.

The fact that Roller Derby consists of both men and women probably increased the excitement. After all, how often is it that you get to see two women throwing fist for fist? Whether they were out to maim each other is another story entirely, but malicious intent or not, it's an infrequent time when an audience gets to see women performing the most manly (unwomanly) of acts.

As the plot unfolded, objective two was simple: Establish realism. Lead actress Ann Calvello entered stage left. The act was split into two scenes (commonly referred to as halves) with Calvello leading out the "visiting" Jolters. If at Bowker she would have received a standing ovation; while at Curry Hicks she created such a furor as to have half of the Cage rising and cheering her, and the other half rising and booing her. Somehow the crowd had been propagandized effectively enough so that the entire group joined voices whenever Calvello went down or was hurt. She was the actress to whom the crowd was addressing their animosities, and she played the part well, taking an extra fall here and there, giving the crowd all they wanted to see, and then some.

The fact that acting seemed to pervade the sincerity of the sport really leads to the question of what Roller Derby is? A sport? Somehow it just doesn't make it. The category of entertainment medium fits the bill much better. True, points are scored in Roller Derby, but is that alone necessary for the category of sport? True, there are records held, there is a divisional set-up, there are leading scorers for the league, and there is even a handbook out on the "sport's" past history, one couldn't help but be impressive by the seeming legitimacy of the "sport". In fact the pre-game commentaries were so outstanding that many in the audience was wondering why they hadn't heard more about it.

But the acting involved ruined the image of Roller Derby. As one fan observed, "Roller Derby isn't really a sport, or if it is, it's as much a one as professional wrestling." Most everyone knows the word is out about wrestling. It begins with "F" and it's spelled either Fake, Fix, or Fraud. Admittedly, the roller skating marvels make it much more believable that do the wrestlers, but there were just too many things "wrong" with the contest to label it "sport".

Many will way, sure there are fights in Roller Derby, but look at the other professional sports. And it's true, that hockey and basketball and football have their share of bouts every now and then. So why not in Roller Derby? Realistically, there is no reason to deny the possibility, but the striking parallelism falls apart when we begin to look at the consistent frequency of the fighting taking place in Roller Derby. The fights last Saturday started right away, which seemed sort of suspicious to begin with.

Still it was hard to tell if the gme was a big fraud. It became evident that only single fights were taking place. No teammates were jumping in to help out, every bout was one on one, and how often do you see that, teammates standing by and watching? Still though, it was hard to tell, because even in hockey a third party is unlikely to join in because of the new rule about third party's.

Then between periods, while the opposite sex took the rink, the teams watched cooly and calmly. Now if two girls, or two guys for that matter, were really really mad at each other, can't you see a fight erupting during their rest periods. Yet none arose, they seemed content to watch their opposite sex put on the show, until it was again their turn to perform.

Doubts still lingered over the farcical nature of the "sport", maybe, just maybe, they all had quick tempers, and calmed down quickly. And when Jolter Calvello stepped on one girl's face with her roller skate-what could one think? This couldn't be fake! Yet somehow, miraculously, this girl arose quickly and was skating around minutes late as if nothing had happened. Time and again this same sequence of events took place. A skater would get hurt, would cringe and grimace, would appear to be mortally wounded, only to return to the bench and return to the action some 30 minutes later.

Throughout the 96 minute act, skaters were holding their sides, their backs, their heads, while skating around,. And as soon as attention had been successfully diverted, the hands stopped and the action rolled on.

It would seem impossible for Roller Derby to continue if the violent acts were really hurting people, unless of course there were yearly breaks in between each match allowing the participants to rest up.

Thus the "sport" aspect of Roller Derby seems lacking, not to deny that it's a wonderful bit of entertainment. If that's the sort of thing you're in for, it was an enjoyable and skillful night of action. Like boxing it provided the thrill of seeing someone knocked apart, and everyone knows they just love to see a fight, whether in a hockey match at a basketball game or a Roller Derby contest (I guess that's man's basic nature, one of pent up anxieties, getting released vicariously!).

It's really a shame that the promoters of Roller Derby neglected to bring some ketchup with them, just imagine how much more legitimate the contest would have seemed.

But as an entertainment medium Roller Derby was a marvelous production. In fact having seen past productions made it a highly predictable evening. Throughout the night we were given the whip, the block, the under-the-legs move, and the around the outside and inside moves. But having seen past shows, I knew the through the arms maneuver was yet to be used. And sure enough, not five minutes from the end there he went, a jamming Chief boomed through two Jolters for a quick two points.

Presdictability went a bit farther, too, until it reached out to the actual scoring of points. The plot devised was to keep the visitors out ahead, to evoke as much emtion for the Chiefs, (oops, for Our Chiefs) as possible. This was done superbly, as the Chiefs would close in and the Jolters would score some go ahead points. One time near the end, the Jolters had a five point lead, and it appeared that the Chiefs simply HAD to score some points. And what happened??? Why two Jolters somehow "missed" their blocks, and whoosh, there were the Chiefs right back in the contest.

The plot's third objective? Keep the score close and excitement high. As successive as the propaganda objective was, so was the final Derby goal. In fact, excitement hit its peak in the final minute. The Jolters led by three going into the final minutes, and a Chief scored two points, and was still going as time ran out. Even if, by some fluke of misinterpretation, the Roller Derby contest was for real, there couldn't have been a better master plan than what evolved.

The entertainers gave the crowd a little of everything, a few people flying over the guard rails, one skater jumping off the rail onto two of his opponents, and a good old fashioned slugging match featuring two of the more unwomanly women. The act was so well performed that the audience left with a strong feeling of hatred for the lead actress, Ann Calvello, and nothing pleased the audience more than seeing her take licks throughout the night.

The entertainment had a unique twist in that women participated, and fights amongst women are about as rare a phenomenon (at least in public) as seeing President Nixon and Spiro Agnew kissing.

The propaganda was brilliant, and one couldn't help but laugh as the announcer repeated time and again, how "Our Chiefs" were the number one team in the league, and "Our Chiefs" were losing and "Our Chiefs" were scoring points, it really was rather comical.

If a criticism were to be voiced about the entertainment quality of the derby, it would have to be along the lines of false advertising, or perhaps lack of advertising. Many were coming to see something different, and weren't particularly pleased by the violence involved. Most of those people left Curry Hicks Cage at halftime, as they ranged in feelings from disgust to boredom. Obviously those people didn't know what they were in for, but those who managed to last for the hour and a half match were treated to a masterful production.

As a sport, now way' as entertainment, O.K., as the establishment of realism loomed as the only objective to fail miserably. The whole crew that Roller Derby sent to UMass seemed more like a company of actors who travel from town to town performing for an audience. They performed very well, and should be complimented on an excellent show. But if Roller Derby was in Bowker Auditorium, where was Bluebeard taking place?

A Static Extravaganza

By KENNETH SULIN

Last Saturday night Roller Derby hit the Cage for its first time resulting in a flurry of mixed emotions and impressions. Probably for most the deepest they've ever got into the sport was an occasional viewing on Channel 56; however, the event turned out to be a success for those who were hungry for similated violence.

As we all know things like Roller Derby and big time wrestling are pretty comical at times with their attempts at convincing the audience of a purely natural sporting event, free of any fixing or faking out. What we witnessed was good and may even come across to be realisitc, but you can be sure half of it was merely a put-on to attract the audience's attention.

To the surprise of most of the track seemed unusually small, hardly large enough to support the entire cast of players; however, it evidently sufficed as the show got underway. The skaters themselves were relatively young looking which made one wonder why anybody would make a career of such a thing--probably the speculative $800 per player was the answer.

The crowd began coming in around 6 P.M. and by 7:30 the stands were about three-fourths full. Only two people skated around the track to keep everyone happy, but soon they left and people started becoming impatient. Clapping and foot-stomping resulted, but nothing came from it. Finally the home team, the New England Chiefs, made their debut for warm-up procedures--the Jolters followed and at last things got underway.

A look at the individual members showed a various assortment of contestants stretching from make-up plastered girls to worn-torn, scar-faced men. The women proved to be the more interesting likely due to the lack of women's participation in contact sports. As it turned out, the girls started things off with a minimum (at first) of poking and jabbering, kicking and falling. All eyes, nevertheless, fell on one particular member of the Jolters by the name of Ann Calvello. Ann was the center of attraction for the entire evening, looking as if she had just popped her head from a bottle of make-up, this only to be overshadowed by her striking semi-shagged bleached blonde hair. She was the ringleader--the villianess extravaganza who inevitably kept the show going. As she circled the track she was jeered by the spectators on one side and cheered by the other; however, all seemed to remember her the most.

The men were sly and tactful, but seldom proved to be convincing. If you were close enough you may have been able to catch a smile on the cupped face of a player who was sprawled on the floor supposedly in the utmost of pain. For the men, a Chief named Charlie O'Connor was the audience's favorite and such chants from his cheering section from 5 Webster West were:

Go Go Charlie O
Bite his nose and rip his toes.

The men seemed overly brave and audacious, the little guys took on the big guys without batting an eyelash, again kicking, pulling and chasing them around and through the track.

As the teams proceeded to the locker rooms, something not overly surprising, but unusual enough occurred. If you happened to be sitting in the east sidestands you probably noticed the players pinching any girl that happened to be standing nearby.

When many thought the game had finally come to a close, they were overwhelmed that half-time had only been reached, and they'd be in store for another hour of animated brutality.

The women began again, only their tempers were flaring just a bit more than in the previous half. One could now see punches land that looked terribly authentic and maneuverings that sent skaters flying through the air with the greatest of ease, unfortunately only to hit the deck or be dangled on the outer railings. In fact, a number of team members were completely hurled from the track, but boldly climbed back on for a return to the action.

There were a variety of scraps and brawls much to the crowd's enjoyment. One fight occurred during the women's session in which a small Chief knocked a tall six foot Jolter to the floor--her punch never really hit anything but thin air; however, to make it look impressive the Jolter squirmed on the floor writhing in pain and agony. The men were violent at times; as we could see a little Chief climb upon the railing and throw his entire body on two opposing team members who were already strung out on the floor--there was no way this incident could have been acted out.

The audience was having a pretty good time and the Cage activities were usual--the promoters went as far as having hawkers peddle their banners, emblems and programs throughout the crowd to make it seem even more realistic.

There were an array of photographers including Jim Gold, editor of the Collegian, who was nearly scared out of his pants when the infamous blonde snapped at him for snapping her picture.

As the event continued we could see the same repetitious mannerisms that prevailed in the first half. For those unacquainted with the sport, it was becoming a boring evening. The only activities which stirred the spectators were obviously the fights and battles, otherwise it remained rather dull.

After the game had concluded half-serious autograph hounds were bugging the skaters--surprisingly enough they complied in giving their signatures. These people, as ruthless as they seem, were just happy-go-lucky participants all but welcoming their share of bruises from the night's performance. They're terrific actors and they know it. They seem to enjoy riling the crowd, but underneath they're just like everyone else.

Fiery Ann Cavello, or The Passive One

Exclusive! New Beatles Album In Offing

By STOVE FELD

Apple Records issued an official statement a little over a years ago which informed us there would be absolutely no new material recorded by the Beatles. All that was recorded was released and everyone just better forget the idea of any new Beatles' album. It was a short statement, and directly to the point. Maybe this is why most of us accepted it without any questions, failing to realize that this remark couldn't possibly be true.

While they were together, the Beatles made eighteen record albums. This number fluctuates because many of their releases came out under different names in England. Although there are different songs on their English albums, they were all, sooner or later, released in America. For awhile, such songs as "Nowhere Man" and "Drive My Car" were only available in England, until they finally were released here. The English Revolver had the three new songs that were in the American Yesterday... And Today. Consequently, there was no Yesterday . . . And Today released in England. The same is true for Magical Mystery Tour. All the tunes from the TV special were released on an Extended Playing record in England. But, in the end, there weren't any Beatle songs that were released in England that weren't released here.

The last record made by the Beatles was Abbey Road. It was released before Let It Be, but recorded after it. Abbey Road was contemporary because its last words made a fitting epitaph for the Beatle's gravestone: "And in the end, the love you take, is equal to the love you make." Abbey Road sounded slick, but in reality it was just a convenient way of gathering bits and pieces of songs that were just "hanging around," either on tape or on paper.

Abbey Road is representative of the fact that not all of the Beatles' music is on their records. If the Lennon-McCartney relationship was sped up just a few months, it would be doubtful if Abbey Road would have ever been recorded, and by that time most of Side Two was already in the can, just waiting to be pieced together. None of that material would have been released, Apple would have made sure of that.

There have been with the Beatles, as with every recording artist, numerous out-takes during the actual studio time. These include the early stages of a developing song, just fooling around (sometimes with interesting effects, witness the movie Let It Be), and actual songs thought of as not up to par. I, personally, have a tape, about one minute long, of an out-take of "Hey, Jude". Needless to say, it is incredible. Lennon sings on some of it, McCartney literally screams the ending, and George Martin, their producer, offers comments to Paul throughout it. McCartney surely couldn't have written the song more than a week before. In fact, there are some lyrics that are just mumbled, they weren't written by then.

This is just one small example of what is sitting around in some executive's vaults. There is undoubtedly more.

Yellow Matter Custard is a bootleg record of thirteen previously unreleased songs, and one already recorded song, by the Beatles. The title is taken from a line in Lennon's "I Am the Walrus": "Yellow matter custard dripping from a dead dog's eye". Yellow Matter Custard is the early Beatles. It sounds more like Introducing The Beatles than any other album. The voices, harmonies and guitar licks all hint of the early days.

The album is a demo tape, something made up to give to the record companies as an example of the group's sound. Among the fourteen songs is "To Know You Is To Love You", an old standard featuring John and Paul in harmony, much like on "Two of Us" from Let It Be. Also is the previously recorded rocker "Slow Down". It is considerably less wild and John sings it, as he does on the album Something New. Also outstanding is a minor-key blues song featuring John on lead vocals and excellent back-up harmonies by Paul and George. This, as are all the songs, is nameless. There are no titles or songwriting credits given. It is very possible that only a few were written by the Beatles. Also possible is that Pete Best, not Rongo, was the drummer. These are definitely the Beatles, though, there is absolutely no mistake about it.

The quality of the record is poor, worse than your typical bootleg. It is in mono with just the side number on the label. The record itself is on red vinyl. The cover is in shaded yellow and it exalts the phrase "Previously unreleased studio material" underneath the title of the album and the group's name. In the upper right corner is a circle around which is written "Trademark of Quality." Inside the circle is a pig. The inner spiral contains the pressing number: BBL 513. And this is all that is known about the epic Yellow Matter Custard. All that is left is speculatiion.

Yellow Matter Custard is thought of as coming from California. It costs $10,000. There is just one copy known existing in this area and I, unfortunately, do not own it.

Coming at a time when bootleg records are all but nonexistent, Yellow Matter Custard is unbelievable. It is the first concrete proof of anything new from the Beatles. Capitol Records has admitted to possessing tapes of the Beatles live at the Hollywood Bowl and also live in Europe. But they are stubbornly sitting on them, waiting for God-knows-when before they officially release them. Attention record pirates: these tapes are in Capitol's vaults in Hollywood, California among hours and hours of never-before-heard Beatle music.

Through press releases, nosey reporters and by accident, it is known that these songs do exist. Among them are George Harrison's "Not Guilty," recorded during the sessions for the White Album, and Lennon-McCartney's "Zero is Just Another Even Number." Also recorded is the Beatles' rendition of Harrison's "All Things Must Pass," the title song from his solo album which was written two years before his album came out. About three years ago it was reported that Paul McCartney cancelled all his appointments because he felt that he had written another "Yesterday" and wanted to stay at home and work on it. Nothing has been heard about that song since.

Hopefully, Yellow Matter Custard will be the spark that set the fire. There is just too much material and it's doing no good lying around in some fat cat's office. Either way, I'm sure that we haven't heard the last from either bootleg records or the Beatles.

King Crimson Islands

By STEPHEN COLWELL

King Crimson's newest album, Islands, could quite possibly be their finest in terms of musical creativity. Once again, the talents of Robert Fripp and Peter Sinfield combine to produce an album that is musically and artistically a work of genius. But works of genius are not meant to be experienced by everyone, and are not capable of being enjoyed by everyone. So those of you out there who like Rod McKuen, and smile buttons, and who think that "Who's Next" was the best album of 1971, you may as well stop reading this review because I'm not talking to you. Besides, you're past the point of no return. For the others:

As you may or may not know, Robert Fripp and Peter Sinfield have been looking for a lead singer and bass player ever since Greg Lake (now with Emerson, Lake, and Palmer) left the group. The addition of Boz Scaggs, formerly with The Steve Miller Band, fills the gap admirably. Gordon Haskell, featured as lead singer on the Lizard album, is gone and his loss to the group is nothing to mourn. Andy McCulloch, also featured on Lizard, whose drum playing left something to be desired, although it was not nearly as bad as Michael Giles, whose pounding ruined the second Crimson album, In the Wake of Poseidon, is also gone from the group, having been replaced by Ian Wallace.

The album itself is comprised of six songs, three a side, and carries a general theme of sailors, islands, and love. All the lyrics were written by Peter Sinfield. Formentera Lady and Sailor's Tale, are run together and concern a sailor's love affair with a dancer in spain. The third song on side one, "The Letters," relates how the sailor's Spanish lover writes to the wife of the sailor, informing her of their love affair, and ends with the wife killing herself as well as her husband.

Side Two starts with a song about groupies, called "Ladies of the Road," and features some nice harmony, the kind that the Beatles used to sing. "Song of the Gulls," is the prettiest song on the album and an instrumental done in classical music style. "Islands," the final song of the album is a beautiful love song about two people, islands in the sea of people around them, who meet and join hands forever, remembering and learning from the sailor's tale of side one.

Musically, this album, like all of King Crimson's, is not six different songs, but one song with six parts. Robert Fripp wrote all the music, and is, without a doubt, the best musical composer alive. People could argue that Justin Hayward, Ian Anderson, or Stevie Winwood are musical geniuses, but they really don't come close to Robert Fripp. I realize that's a dangerous statement to make, but it's true. The music is to all extents and purposes, indescribable in words. You have to listen to it to appreciate it. But, as I stated earper, the music isn't meant for everyone. At least, some of you out there should know what I mean.

Anyway, all I can really say is listen to the album, but listen to the album alone. If you don't see that King Crimson is quite possibly the only group on the world that can make an equal relationship between music, your own thoughts and the outside world, just try to get rid of the album. If you can see the relationship, thin don't let the secret out, don't bring this album to a party, and don't dare play it more than once a week. King Crimson could very well be so musically advanced, that they won't achieve the recognition they deserve for another decade, so "Like marron-glaced fish bones, Oh, Lady hit the road."

For Those Who Love Firesign Theatre

By MIKE KOSTEK

Dear Friends—The Firesign Theatre; (Columbia, specially priced two record set).

How long can they go on? Four of America's most perceptive, talented and entertaining people came together about five years ago to form a new art form those roots are steeped mainly in radio, but reach back to W.C. Fields, and dip productively into Lord Buckley, Bob & Ray, Ernie Kovacs, the Marx Brothers and R. Crumb. They recorded albums with a keen vision into the nuanaces of all of our daily lives. Wether it be writing their material, or performing their material, The Fire Sign Theater works its craft perfectly.

Their first album, Waiting For The Electrician Or Someone Like Him isn't very good. It has too many ideas and theme that just weren't given enough attention, but still there could be seen, something new and tremendously exciting in the way that you played this "comedy" album over and over again (especially side two). What did you do with your other comedy albums up to that point? After you're played Bill Coby, Rusty Warren, Don Rickles, Bob Newhart et. al, a few times for yourself you'd put them on the shelf and drag them out for friends ("Oh, you've simply got to hear Allan Shepard's new album!") and parties (All right, who here hasn't heard Geroge Karlan's album?) One look at all of these albums will tell you why you laughed the first five times you heard the record, then smiled on subsequent listernings. All these records were made with one person in front of a mike and usually in front of a live audience so you'd be sure to know when to laugh. And so Bill, Bob, Redd, Rusy Allan would tell their jokes, the audience would yukitup and there you are. How many times can you hear the same joke? A very hot medium. Very show bizzy.

The only exception to this were Lord Buckley, Lenny Bruce and Don Rickles(yes). These three talked so fast with such complex and different material that they stood up under being frozen on vinyl and played over and over. Still, there was a giant spare in this area that remained unfilled.

The Firesign Theatre creates novels, movies in your mind. The listener becomes more than another yukker in the audience, he sees panoramas, he hears the characters moving in time and space. He realizes that reality is being used, misused and abuse. For the first time there is multi-tracking of primary characters as well as extensive use (and sensitive use) made of panning. That is, the main characters have a habit of talking at the same time or are upstaged by sound effects and move back and forth from speaker to speaker. It will be truely unbelievable when the Firesign comes out in quadrasonic, as then they will be able to pin point areas of sound anywhere in the area enclosed by the speakers.

"This is the freest medium for us. Movies and television are too complicated and restricted. This is a way we can express this round table and sent it out."–Dave Ossman of the Firesign.

How Can You Be In Two Places At Once When You're Not Anywhere At All? was their second album and featured two different unified sides, one dealing with the extreme odyssey of someone who buys a car and winds up in an Egyptian pyramid being told America's vitures in word, movie and song. It is an excellently insane blend of used car commercials, W.C.Fields, old war movies, Elvis Presley, you name it. The second side features "The Further Adventures Of Nick Danger, Third Eye" and is an impaccible spoof of private eye radio shows in the '30's and '40's. The Firesign's characters usually get caught up in the trappings of their medium; Nick Danger flashes back to the past and can't remember what he's supposed to do to get out of it. Our friend who buys the car on the first side tries his climate control (Tropical Paradise) and finds himself in one. On the second side we are listening to lesson six in our study of Turkish (on Waiting For The Electrician) when we are transported to Turkey.

"The one mind that seems to have the same vision as ours is R. Crumb. His cover to the last Whole Earth Catalogue is a kind of visual representation of the Firesign mind."–Peter Bergman of the Firesign (the Baid One).

Don't Crush That Dwarf, Hand Me The Pliers is the first unified concept album, with the same characters and story running on both sides. Don't Crush That Dwarf is a brilliant story of the near future, with echoes of the past, our past and our present, running through the story. This is an electronic novel, but with far greater possibilities for full realization of texture and character identity than the printed page. Don't Crush That Dwarf received a Hugo (the Oscar of the science fiction world) and was the first time the Firesign's talents were fully realized. A tremendous record, both funny and frightening in its implications.

I Guess We're All Bozos On This Bus was released last spring and although certainly less successful than Don't Crush That Dwarf, has a certain charm and flavor all its own. Bozos deals again with a square and squared away future, but without the grim humor and fun of its predecessor.

Dear Friends is the latest offering from the Firesign, and is the same, yet different from their previous albums. On the back cover of this "Specially priced two-record set" it says that Dear Friends is "Some of the best from their avant garde radio religious series". From 1966 to 1971 the Firesign appeared sporadically on four different Los Angeles radio stations, their last series being known as "Dear Friends!" and was syndicated to various radio stations around the country, including WMUA. This album is bits and pieces from these broadcasts. Listening to this album is disturbing at first because of the lack of the wacky continuity found on their other works. If Don't Crush That Dwarf and Bozos are full length novels, then Dear Friends is collection of scenes, sketches and individual episodes that could easily fit into a longer story.

It is certainly a varied collection of routines (some improvised), raning from "The T.B. Guide" timed at 5:50 to a nifty commercial, "Balliol Bros." at 1:45. Some cuts feature elaborate sound effects, others are merely at the mad four delving into unprecidented depths on some impromptu subject. Any impromptu subject. And there lies the problem. Imagine if this had been their first album. What would be the reaction to it? Not much. There are 29 cuts on here. They deal with the usual Firesign subjects, tongue-tied announcers, "Duke Of Madness Motors", pompous announcer pastors, a great satire on the commercial selling those 40 Great Melodies, J. Edgar, flipped out Chicanos (It was the Firesign that paved the way for Cheech & Chong) , talk show announcers coping with leaky guests and sunthetic chinchillas, those idiot insipid parade announcers, all the usual incompetents that invade our lives through radio and TV. One nice feature is that for the first time individual credit is given to each voice (Phil Proctor is the Pooper). By the way, total album time is 74:05.

"We work in language. We're so good with our language instruments that we practiced on so long that we can make a sentence of eight or ten words that's so loaded–just like we are–that you hear it first and you hear it second and third and you begin to work it together."–Phil Austin of the Firesign.

"We also use sounds for their associative value, in terms of memory and the way the brain functions. That's why we operate from pun, and what people call the destruction of words, to create associations between words that are in essence a manifestation of the way the brain really works. 'Cause that's how it locks things together."–Phil Proctor.

The sound of the Firesign is musical. The seemingly disparate and dissonant sounds they put together form a music, a music of sounds. If you're a Firesign nut and you hear the "Shoes For Industry" commercial from Don't Crush That Dwarf, your mind will find itself hearing the sounds to come at the end of the commercial, just as in a symphony.

Poets of sound, telling us about Kinetic Heat Ratios, and we love it. They play with the sound of words ("Toad Away"), and with the sound made by a string of words, much like Captain Beefheart's poetry. I love the way they say their lines "Where do you go when you're toad away?"

"We talk about the radio shows, the pure improvisation, with sometimes nothing but a newspaper or book to start things off. And this leads to that very thing happening at the table. Sombody introduces a word or phrase, maybe reads from something nearby, then somebody else picks it up and runs it for a while, maybe leads it off in his own direction until somebody else knows where it should go and takes it. Voices change to suit the mood and situation."–

Those of you that love the Firesign Theatre, this album will give you a good insight into facets of these folks that we haven't seen before. Those of you that haven't heard the light yet, go borrow your neighbor's copy of Don't Crush That Dwarf. You'll hear.

Slick and Snickering Melodrama

By MARY LOU GORDON

Such Good Friends

Written for the screen by Esther Dale, from the novel by Lois Gould; produced and directed by Otto Preminger, starring Dyan Cannon, Lawrence Luckinbill, and James Coco.

Such Good Friends is a visciously comical vignette of two swinging New York couples that occasionally oversteps the boundaries of comedy to become a mock parody of a basically lopsided and grotesque situation. The snickering cynicism that is worked into this film loses some of its comic properties and effectiveness by a parallel level of seriousness that adds sporatic touches of hard reality to the playful situations described. It seems as if Otto Preminger couldn't decide whether he wanted the movie to be a plainly funny situation comedy, a perverse and satirical farce, or a good working melodrama, so he incorporated aspects of all three into the film.

The plot is cliched and rather boring, as it deals with an unfaithful husband and his unsuspecting wife who learns the shocking news in a most cruel manner. The movie is no high-powered dazzler or super-cinematic experience, but there are enough unexpected twists and unusual circimstances to sustain interest in the film, regardless of the slow pace and simplicity of plot.

The movie is concerned with Julie and Richard, who are married, and Cal and Miranda, who are not, and the circumstances that make their relationships become closely entwined and intermingled. The basic emphasis though, is on Julie and the crisis she undergoes throughout the film.

At the outset, Richard is going to the hospital to have a mole removed from his neck, a process which is described to Julie by Tim, a doctor and close friend, as being very simple and routine. It turns out that the surgeon cuts a vein in Richard's neck, and he has to be given a blood transfusion from which he has a severe allergic reaction, and goes into a coma. He has to undergo a complete transfer of all his blood, after which something goes wrong with his liver and then his kidneys. This takes up a great part of the movie, with many scenes in the hospital and in conferences with doctors. The humor which lies here deals with bustling hospital confusion, medical malpractice and incompetence, but it is often not very funny because of the seriousness with which Julie is affected. She is becoming emotionally and physically drained by all of this, while the blundering doctors continue to bumble their way through verbose rhetorical explanations, claiming no real responsibility and expressing no real concern for her plight.

At the point where Richard is at his worst, Julie discovers a little black book in his desk that has many dates, symbols and drawings in it. She regards it as nothing, until she is confronted by Cal with the news that Richard has been cheating on her with his girlfriend Miranda for over a year now. Julie, who is devastated by this, confides in Tim, who lets it slip in conversation that there have been others besides Miranda. Julie goes back to the little book and figures out the code to find that he has been cheating with just about every woman that they know. She talks with Miranda, who tells her that Richard has proposed to her if she will accept. So with the possibility of a divorce as soon as Richard is well, Julie returns to the hospital the following day to learn that Richard has just had a breathing failure and is dying. With Cal and Miranda at her side, she accepts quietly the final news of his death, and returns home with the others, at which point the film ends as we see Julie leave the house with her two young sons and enter the park across the street.

DYAN CANNON AND LAURENCE LUCKINBILL

The dramatic moments in the film are effectively portrayed and carried by Dyan Cannon as Julie, who lends warmth, charm and actuality to her role. The numerous scenes we have of her lying alone in bed, fearing for her husband and thinking back to the days when they first met and were deeply in love, were executed with a sensitivity that makes her seem such a lonely, almost pitiable woman, that the movie becomes, for a while at least, very real and very sad. The news of Richard's betrayal hits her hard, and she reacts with the horror and insult indicative of any human in such situation.

But Preminger doesn't keep her sadness constant, as we later see her in two of the funniest scenes of the movie, one where she becomes drunk with Cal the night that she finds out about Richard, where she poses nude for him and ends up being seduced in a comical attempt that doesn't work out too well. She later goes on to seduce Tim, by pulling off him clothes and orally arousing him, while he is very collectively trying to talk to a patient on the phone. She vascilates between feeling an open wound of pain and injury over Richard and an opposing nonchalant attitude that says if he can do it, so can she.

Through flashbacks early in the movie, we learn that Julie was a virgin until just prior to her marriage to Richard, resisting him as long as possible, giving in only when Richard took her by force. We are shown flashes even further back in time, to Julie's early and awkward adolescent stages, where we see her theatrical and cold mother degrading her physical appearance instead of giving her the usual motherly compliments and encouragements. There is also one obscure little flash to a group of girls who have the appearance of private school preppies, with Julie talking to a very lesbianish looking girl, who is telling Julie how pretty she is. We see this woman come into the hospital near the end of the movie and approach a shocked and much taken back Julie with the question, "How's Richard doing?" Without Julie's answering, we are flashed back to a scene with Julie sitting in bed and the girl on her knees beside the bed asking, "How does Richard compare in bed to me?" The picture zooms back to the present with Julie answering both questions for us with her answer to the first - "Better."

Preminger has given us the portrait of a woman who grew up feeling psychologically inferior as a female, was involved in a seemingly homosexual relationship early in life that could have resulted from or in an instilled fear of men, and who has been having a not too fulfilling sexual relationship with her husband. Julie's determination to prove her sexuality and desirability after finding out about Richard is a deplorable attempt at convincing herself, the two men involved, and her husband that she really is a sexually appealing woman, but she is resolved to such a pitiable state that while her overt actions, such as those with Cal and Tim, are highly funny, her real situation is not.

Laurence Luckinbill, for the short time that we see him before he goes into a coma for the duration of the film, is very funny and refreshingly witty. His sharp sense of humor and personality work well in conjunction with James Coco, who can make comedy out of the most trite dialogue. Jennifer O'Neill, who plays Miranda, does little more in the film than look pretty, act seductive and smile sweetly.

The secondary charactrs in this film are well worth notice - they are comprised of an amazingly large conglomeration of clearly defined types, and with a group of glamorous, cosmopolitan New Yorkers, imagination has no limits. We see the very dramatic and stagey looking hustlers, a young and hip chickie who is trying to find out what its all about and get it all together, a tall, skinny, short-haired intellectual, the super chic and Vogue-ish looking women who never crack smiles, beauties who have been transformed by nose operations, and those who have turned to fake beauty marks, along with flabby old men who wear girdles and old women who frequent Elizabeth Arden's to have their thighs waxed.

Such Good Friends is not an excellent film nor is it worthlessly bad, When the movie is funny, it is joltingly wicked and hard, executed with the grace and slickness of a con-artist. The mode of expression in this film is often tastelessly bad; the satirical force of the jokes made of the love-marriage-adultery triangle is frequently harsh and difficult to laugh at because of the simultaneous reality of pain and injury that is going on. The loaded satire that is injected into bittersweet reality makes the film sway between two poles, where a more constant tone would have rendered the intentions with more clarity. The slightly obtuse point of view that Preminger chooses to stand on seems to be a significant deterrant to the film, in addition to the lack of zest and smoothness of pace needed to make it an outrageously good film.

No One Admitted Without A Vomit Bag

By BOB NESTI

Night of the Living Dead began with $6000 and a vague idea director George Romero had of transforming an allegorical story he had written into "a real blood and guts film." The results overwhelm the viewer with a series of grotesque images unequalled for their sheer audacity by any film within memory. The major distinction if that the film makes explicit the gore we've always wanted horror films to show, and without exaggeration has claims to being the most gruesome and frightening film ever made.

The transformation from the vague to the specific is the film's most distinguishing characteristic and this genre finally gets the right jolt of tastelessness needed to completely alter the form. Prior to Night horror films often left audiences disappointed. They would suggest behavior, imply the grotesque, and finally resort to cinematic trickery to gloss over the specific grossness of their situations. Few filmmakers were audacious enough to skirt the public's taste in order to shock them, and, interestingly enough, the horror films which are clearly remembered as being masterful excursions into pure shock have also been graphic enough to be called tasteless. Psycho is the most obvious example. Hitchcock once doesn't shirk from the inherent perverse possibilities of his material. Rather he exploits them to their full potential. The story of a young man with a double personality, one basically meek and the other homicidal, wasn't unknown from films; what made it specifically odd and frightening was Hitchcock's brashness, a brashness which allowed for the leading lady to be murdered in a scene of overwhelming brutality within the first reel.

Psycho exploits our raw emotions. Night of the Living Dead does even better. It is a brilliant idea realized on film, a huge sick joke acted out in complete seriousness and executed with unusually astute cynicism. The idea is what would happen if one night the recently dead came alive and stalked the country murdering the living, not only killing their victims but eating them, sometimes both at the same time. The premise is as absurd as it is frightening, and it is pretty scary for we witness our own worst fears come true. When the initial premise of ghouls murdering people and devouring the flesh is accepted, the raw emotional power Night elicits has a numbing quality. Witnessing the film is like being caught in a snare the more you may try to escape the raw grip, the tighter a hold it gets.

The hold comes immediately in the creepy opening sequence which takes place in a cemetery on a late afternoon. A rather dimwitted blonde named Barbara and her snively brother have reluctantly come to visit their dead mother's grave. As they bicker, a disheveled, middle-aged man wanders in the distance, slowly moving toward them. When they come to pass each other, the man unexpectedly attacks them, knocking the brother to the ground and his death. Barbara escapes and finds shelter in a near seemingly abandoned farmhouse. She quickly learns she isn't the only refugee from the growing number of ghouls outside as here she meets Ben, the film's strong black lead. Together they barricade the house from the flesh-hungry onslaught outside. Unexpectedly from the cellar come the remaining cross-section of American life locked inside the farmhouse: Judy and Tom, a young married couple, Helen and Harry, an unhappy, middle-aged couple, and their sick daughter, Karen, who has been bitten by one of the living dead. The tension increases as the hostilities caused by jarring personalities placed in an intolerable situation become apparent. Ben and Harry argue, Helen and Harry argue, Barbara falls into shock; more importantly they learn through a found television that the ghoulish figures outside the door are the dead returned to life who intend on eating them.

Their bond of strength, already weakened through personal friction, finally crumbles when the young couple Judy and Tom attempt to escape and are barbecued when their truck explodes. From this point through the anticlimatical epilogue, Night of the Living Dead becomes an exercise in unrelenting terror. Elements merely suggested, here and in traditional horror films, are made vivid. First the dead devour the remains of the thoroughly grilled couple which would be absurd if it weren't so grotesque. This is where the inherent power lies for these scenes are so foreign to human experience that the audience can't even divorce itself through ridicule. There is no detachment, only complete involvement in these poor souls' plight. The insane conclusion is tasteless, is horrible, is brutal, yet cleverly exploits the suggested theme and leaves the viewer not only emotionally drained, but unable to visit a cemetery for months.

Cadavers on the march

Much of the coarseness of Night comes from it being a low-budget quickie made in, of all places, Pittsburgh. For the most part, the film has the endearing quality a grade B epic always possesses: grainy black and white photography, simple shots and angles, sparse production details, and mostly unknown actors. In this case, these all work out as unintended plusses as the gritty realism is only accentuated by lack of glossness, and the acting, although earthy, is bad enough to offer the audience a release from the burgeoning tension inherent in the situation. Night would never work as a Hollywood product. It is too coarse in both theme and design to be studio produced. Only the audacity of an independent filmmaker could possibly exploit all the gross power that is found here and director George Romero revels in the gore with sadistic delight. One of the films most unappreciated virtues is its understated wryness. The scenes of the television reporter telling people that there really can't be anything they can do to give their loved ones a proper funeral and burial are richly ironic. There hasn't been a better horror satire since Roger Corman's classic Little Shop of Horrors and where that was mostly forced, overstated, and only mildly frightening, this film tears at the gut while exhibiting an unusually subtle wit.

Director Romera has said he enjoys constructing films like jigsaw puzzles and Night does have a rather impersonal, interlocked quality. The theme is acute insanity in an absurd situation and despite the passion of the events, the camera consistently remains coldly analytical. The characters are, at best, ordinary, even the hero Ben hasn't any distinguishing qualities. At their worst, the rest are pitiful, unable to handle any situation without the pratfalls of human stupidity and ignorance. Much of the tension between Ben and Harry is racial; Helen is blissfully ignorant of the seriousness of her daughter's condition despite the warnings of the television; and even Ben, in the unhappy ending, finally loses any semblance of sanity in dealing with his situation. Night is thoroughly anti-human, keeping its allegorical roots in a completely frightening context.

Romero talent cannot be denied. First he had the shrewdness and perception to see that by being graphic he could cover more ground than any horror film before him. He was detached enough from his material to infuse black humor and irony when necessary, and finally left his film rough, cold, superficially unprofessional. The acting, for the most part, is hardly worth noting, (there was supposedly one professional actor in the group), and the script simply and effectively tells the story. This is nothing distinguishable about the parts, although their whole makes for a near traumatic cinematic experience. You may sneer at the rough edges, but to deny the power of Night of the Living Dead is to ignore talent and the ability of the visual image to scare the living hell out of an audience.

Loud Speakers-Part I

By FRANK JOHNSON

And now, after weeks of discussing purely electronic devices, we turn to the final link in the audio chain- loudspeakers from where the sound ultimately emerges. A good deal of subjective appeal is accorded loudspeakers, and this first article will try to explain how design can influence this appeal.

The operation of loudspeakers in not overly complicated, and they can be viewed as transducers operating in reverse. (For an explanation, see Poor Richard's, 11/19/71). There are two types of loudspeakers in common use: the electrostatic speaker and the dynamic speaker. Of the two, the dynamic is more widespread, forming about 95% of all loudspeakers used in stereo systems and it will constitute the bulk of our discussion here. The electrostatic loudspeaker, while used in some rather good high frequency designs, does not tend to reproduce bass frequencies very well and its application has been restricted to a few rather esoteric types.

Undoubtedly most of us have inspected a dynamic loudspeaker in some form or another; most probably the one seen came out of an old auto radio or table model that had seen better days. Although this loundspeaker most of the time is simply referred to as a "speaker", it is designed, for economic reasons, to handle only a fairly narrow segment of the audio spectrum-the midrange. The quality of the equipment originally powering this speaker did not necessitate a wide response capability. If the manufacturer wanted to enlarge this response, he probably would have incorporated more than one speaker.

Multi-speaker designs are necessary because it is difficult to manufacture a single speaker that will respond well at high and low extremes of musical demands. If we offer 2 loudspeakers- one for the high treble and another for the low bass, we can optimize each design and get better overall frequency response. Because the wavelength for the treble is smaller or shorter than the bass, the treble speaker must likewise be smaller than the bass reproducer. It is appropriately called a "tweeter". The bass speaker, utilizing similar onomatopoeia, is known as a "woofer". When operating in tandem these speakers are usually not connected in parallel because high and low frequencies must be separated to avoid distortion that would occur if they were mixed in the respective speaker. Thus, a woofer and a tweeter are separated by a "crossover network". An inductional coil, known as a choke, will not pass low frequencies very well; conversely, a capacitor will not pass high frequencies effectively. These components are incorporated in a crossover network to separate the two speakers.

The respective response of a woofer and a tweeter may further be optimized by an interim speaker, a midrange, to take care of the middle frequencies. It also must have a tap from the crossover network when it operates with the other two speakers. However, the number of speakers used in a system does not increase the quality necessarily; it has been my experience that many two-way systems sound better than other three-way systems. Nevertheless, a well-designed 3-way system using a midrange is theoretically a further refinement.

It is also possible to allow a woofer to accomodate both the highs and the lows. The tweeter may be mounted across the woofer's face, in which case the speaker is called a "coaxial" speaker (or coax, for shot), or else another smaller speaker can be directly coupled to the center of the woofer. This latter type is called a "dual cone" speaker. However, these designs are falling out of favor at present, and they are included here for the sake of completeness.

Although a woofer is physically much larger than a tweeter (necessitated because it has to move more air), its design principle is identical. Both speakers run according to electromagnetic induction- the same property that makes turntable motors and phono cartridges operate. If an alternating current is fed into a coil, some magnetism will be generated. If this energy is met by a similar and opposing force, and coupled to a radiating surface, sound will be produced. This is the principle surrounding the "dynamic" speaker. The face of the speaker, which is usually a large circular surface, is called the "cone", and this is the radiator which distributes the physical energy and pushes the air molecules so as to convert it into acoustical energy.

At the apex of the cone, there is a small cylinder on which coil windings of metal wire are wound. This is known as the voice coil. It surrounds a permanent magnetic structure whose magnetic field is supplied by a magnet at the opposite end of the voice coil. For permanent magnetic properties, a metal alloy such as alnico (aluminum, nickel, and cobalt) is used so that the magnetic field will not gradually become less intense over a period of time, a decay process known as hysteresis loss.

The cone is not rigidly attached to the rest of the speaker. It is suspended by a flexible material called the "surround" at its widest diameter, and around the voice coil it has another, stiffer suspension called the "spider" (because originally it was made out of plastic and it resembled the legs of a spider). Unlike the cone, which often is constructed from a paper-asphalt composition, the spider nowadays consists of chemically-treated cloth. Both the spider and the surround constitute a very critical area of the speaker, because they supply a form of mechanical resistance or damping, without which the thrusts of the cone would be uncontrolled and rather distorted. More will be said of this later on.

However, after examining the dynamic loudspeaker, we see that the cone's surface has two sides, both of which radiate sound. When the speaker operates out in the open, the two sides interfere with each other and tend to cancel themselves out. No matter how well-designed the speaker is, it will have a rather restricted range when it operates in this manner. Placing the speaker on a board to separate the front from the rear will help, but cancellation will be minimized by mounting the entire speaker in an enclosure. This is why speakers are enclosed or "baffled" when one buys a complete speaker "system".

Most simple table radios and sometimes even the more expensive consoles have their speakers enclosed by an open baffle. But in this case the rear of these speakers is still left open to the air, and very little low bass will be generated. To enhance the sound, we need to totally enclose the speaker in an airtight box, or enclosure, and put some acoustical damping material (such as fiberglass) on the inside to damp out internal vibrations, caused by sonic reflections within the enclosure. The enclosure should be constructed of heavy material such as thick plywood so that the interior does not resonate or "ring" when struck. When totally airtight, the enclosure is called an "infinite baffle".

The only problem with this design is that it must be rather large if the internal volume is to be great enough for the very low bass, which necessitates a large volume because of its greater wavelength. We can diminish the size of the enclosure by either opening a small hole in the enclosure and "tuning" it (in which case it becomes a "bass reflex" enclosure) or else using a different kind of woofer. Either method, as we shall see, has its advantages.

The bass reflex enclosure takes into account the rear radiations from the speaker cone and uses some of them to reinforce the front of the speaker by way of the port or vent formed by the hole. But the actual size of the port must be determined by many variable factors and computed with math and test equipment when it is "tuned" for the smoothest response. In addition, to suppress the internal resonances which occur because the port is open, a tube or duct must be employed and its length must also be computed according to the enclosure's size, the speaker, and the speaker's "resonance". The resonance is defined as the frequency at which the speaker's impedence rises to its highest value- forming greatest opposition to alternating current- and this happens usually in the low bass. The resonant frequency is important to keep in mind because the low limit of useful bass response is somewhere in the neighborhood of the resonant frequency.

Bass reflex designs were once quite popular, but they are now falling out of favor. One reason concerns speaker change over an extended period of time. Woofers become more efficient as they grow older, and this means that their resonant frequency will drop. The port and the duct of the bass-reflex enclosure must then be recomputed, and most audiophiles are not equipped to do this themselves.

These problems, and many others, are eliminated with the very popular "acoustic suspension" design for woofers. This principle employs air as a damping medium in a rather small enclosure. The spider and surround are made to be very flexible, more so than ordinary woofers. The speaker or speaker system is mounted in a fully airtight enclosure, in which the entire inside is packed with damping material. When the rear of the cone radiates, the interior of the enclosure forms a very stiff resistance, and this obviates a restrictive spider or surround. The acoustic damping material further nulls the rear radiations quite effectively.

By this method very small enclosures are possible, and they can be considerably smaller than bass-reflex designs. These systems can be placed on bookshelves or other small spaces. Their greatest advantage, however, is a great reduction in bass harmonic distortion which still persists in other designs, because the bass can be effectively controlled by the internal air resistance and not mechanical restraints such as the surround, a more precise method. For these reasons, acoustic-suspension speaker systems have become quite popular. The only problem with acoustic-suspension types concerns their rather low efficiency. The previous issue on amplifiers dealt with speaker efficiency vs. amplifier power, and their relationship is important. Most conventional speaker systems have about 5-10% efficiency. Acoustic-suspension types are usually 1% efficient or less. Consequently, they demand more power for the same level of loudness, and this means a more expensive amplifier. Even the cheaper acoustic suspension designs require at least 15 watts/channel RMS or more, and most need at least 25 watts. The shopper should keep this in mind when he considers speaker purchases.

Although we've discussed speaker design and operation, a lot about listening and testing remains to be divulged, and it will follow in the next issue.

sick behavior. Dustin Hoffman plays an American mathametician who runs from the violence of his homeland to provinciality of his English wife's country town. He can't escape the gore and Peckinpah reveals it in a climax of unrelenting brutality. Beyond the various forms of murder, there isn't much here. The film's principal virtue is the performance of Susan George as the nasty bitch Hoffman marries, otherwise, a bleak, strident film.

Such Good Friends (Campus Cinemas, Northampton)

A savagely tasteless comic melodrama about a woman who, while her husband lies dying, discovers he had numerous affairs with many of her friends. The humor often comes through gross juxtoposition or plain rank fun; still under the unusually slick hand of Otto Preminger and a fine screenplay by Elaine May (using a pseudonym), the film often is good, dirty fun. The digs are many, from hypocritical chicness to medical malpractice and done with slapstick flair by a large cast led by Dyan Cannon, Laurence Luckinbell, and James Coco. Reviewed on page twelve.

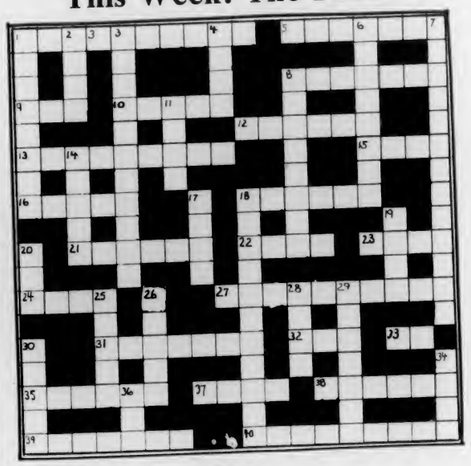
The Thin Man (Saturday, 7:30 and 10:00, Merrill Science Center, Amherst College)

The first of the six "Thin Man" movies, this one, which appeared in 1932 deals with a murderer and the Thin Man, who is his first victim. William Powell portrays detective Nick Charles, the Thin Man, and Myrna Loy plays his wife Nora. Their marriage makes the first time that an affectionate relationship was realistically shown on the screen, and the pairing of Powell and Loy made for one of the most endearing teams of the thirties.

A Space Oddyssey (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)

Unquestionably one of the finest films of recent years and the best space epic ever, Stanley Kubrick's twelve million dollar Modern Odyssey is the surrealistic journey of Man's evolution, from Monkey to Man to Superman. The film is visually the most complex in recent years, a cosmic Marienbad, and the special effects are stunning beyond belief. It is loosely structure in three parts with more along thematic lines than a linear plot, yet is never boring, containing perhaps the most interesting pop philosophy ever filmed. The music score, ranging from Richard Strauss to Ligeti to Johann Strauss, is one of positive brilliant; the script is downbeat black humor, and the direction is impeccable Kubrick, visually complete and beautifully done by America's finest director.

N.Y. and Zee (Wednesday, Showcase Cinemas)



The most inanely titled film quite some time is this bitchy, romantic melodrama that reads like Modern Romance written by Edward Albee. The story concerns unhappy middle-aged marriage in contemporary London and the way three way affair employed to save it. It stars Susannah York as a young botique owner who has an affair with Michael Caine but has tendencies for his wife, Elizabeth Taylor, whose medusa-like presence makes for her most grotesque appearance since Boom! to be reviewed.

Weekend

By MARY LOU GORDON
and BOB NESTI

Theater

A Delicate Balance
Edward Albee's play about some intelligent, witty, and quite desperately lonely people. The theme is serious but the play often is humorous. Tonight, and tomorrow, at Theater 14, Smith College. ($)

Blazing Guns at Roaring Gulch
A Classic melodrama of a western horse-opera, presented by the Thespian Troupe No. 133. The production is directed by Rory Johnston and Peter Taylor, and is at the Amherst Regional High School Aud. The play runs from Friday to Sunday, with a show at 8:00 on Friday and at 2:00 on Saturday and Sunday. ($)

No Exit and the Denouement
Two modern day versions of what it is like to be trapped in Hell. Satre's No Exit concerns three people locked in a room that appears to be Hell, and Thomas Murray's Denouement personifies the hell caused by the interraction of five people. Directed by David Miller and Lauren Robertson and performed by the Thespian Troupe No. 1333, the performances are at Amherst Regional High School from Friday to Sunday at 8:15. ($)

Music

Amherst Folklore Center
This weekend, the center is featuring Happy and Arty Traum, folksingers, Friday at 8:00, Greg Bullen, singer and songwriter Saturday at 8:00, and an Open Hoot, Sunday at 2:00. On Tuesday, February 22 at 8:00 the center presents Jim Kweskin in concert. ($)

Cabaret
The weekly excursion in the musical theater, as performed by the Lion's Share Company in the Blue Wall every Saturday evening at 8:30 and 10:30 this time around, presents the music and lyrics from the off-Broadway hit You're A Good Man, Charlie Brown. The company performs well enough, the surroundings are pleasant, and the sound system quite good. Liquor is served for those who are eligible, otherwise soft drinks and pizza. ($)

Films

Adrift (Cinema X, Springfield)
Directed by Jan Kadar, it is a dramatic and provocative tale of a Czechoslovakian fisherman and his wife, and the circumstances that change their lives when he saves a beautiful girl from drowning in the river. The themes of lust, guilt and love weave this movie into an absorbing drama of a man torn between his wife and the strange ne woman. The film is skillfully photographed, and stars Rade Markovic and Paula Pritchett.

Dirty Harry (Showcase Cinema, West Springfield)
Detective Comics in Panavision, with Clint Eastwood as a San Franciscan counterpart to crime-fighting the superhero comic strip characters. A shrewd, taut, well-made thriller that pits Eastwood as Dirty Harry against insane murderer named Scorpio. Harry is something to be seen as he single-handedly quenches a bank robbery without even sweating and Scorpio often does Harry one better in this sharp fantasy thriller. It has a simplistic theme about liberals and their mealy-mouthed ways, which is all but glossed over by the firm, ingenious hand of Don Seigel.

Fiddler on the Roof (Show case Cinemas, West Springfield)
A mundane version of the longest running musical in Broadway history. The disappointing epic comes away by director Norman Jewison who has employed needless flashy techniques in the transition. The musical becomes bottom-heavy and static when blown up on a Super Panavision screen and blasted out of twelve stereo speakers. The show itself has grace, charm, and a natural warmth that are all but eliminated here. Instead every moment reeks with phony folklines and cornball routines. The excellent Bock-Harnick score has been homogenized in musical interludes embarrassing at best, even Topol, generally considered the best of the stage Tevye's, becomes a glaring caricature of a poor, Russian peasant. An overrated, ill-conceived, charmless musical; with Norma Crane as the dutiful Goldie, andMolly Picon as Yente the Matchmaker.

The French Connection (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)
A fact-based account of how police track down a shipment of heroin in New York City which is a fast, flashy, and fascinating thriller. The grittiness and chaos of New York City is captured at breakneck speed and brutality by director William Friedkin who has fashioned perhaps the stylish and finest thriller in some time. Gene Hackman plays a boorish detective who, as the antisocial, antihuman, detective, somewhere between Bullitt and Joe, the latest film cliche.

The Good, The Bad, and the Ugly (Wednesday, Campus Center Aud. 7 & 9)
The American West during the Civil War is beautifully portrayed in this epic spaghetti western directed with unusual aplomb by Setgie Leone. The story meanders through the prolonged relationships between three decisable outlaws; Lee Van Clift plays a sadistic murderer, Eli Wallach plays a nasty scoundrel, and Clint Eastwood is something of the anti-hero of the film as the Man With No Name. The photography evokes of the dirty, sparseness of the time superbly and the film itself is unusually good for a spaghetti western.

The Hospital (Show case Cinemas, West Springfield)
The world of a big city hospital is brought to life in this grim but often funny film that deals with bizarre and exaggerated situations of medical incompetence, the violent aspects of New York City life, and the bitter story of a middle-aged doctor who is suffering from the termination of a bad marriage. The film stars George C. Scott, Diana Rigg, and is directed by Arther Hiller, with script by Paddy Chayefshy. (To be reviewed)

Johnny Got His Gun (Amherst Cinema)
A remarkably dramatic epic of a World War I soldier that tells the story of a young boy who is victimized by war and military power. Joe Bonham is left armless, legless, speechless and partially faceless to exist as a vegetable, and left with only his mind he tries to communicate to the doctors and nurses who now comprise his world. Contrast is made between his hospital existence, which is photographed in black and white, and his pleasant memories which are in color. It is a soul-searing experience, starring Timothy Bottoms, Jason Robards, Diane Varsi, and directed by Dalton Trumbo.

Key Largo (Jerry Lewis Cinemas, Northampton)
Bacall, Bogart, Barrymore and Edward G. Robinson in this preachy, pretentious melodrama about gangsters hiding out in a remote Florida Hotel. The intention, it seemed was to say something about Post World War II conditions and it does somewhat resemble its prototype The Petrified Forest. Still well worth seeing for the performances of Robinson as the relentless baddie. Bogart as the good but ineffective hero, and Lauren Bacall, Lionel Barrymore, and Claire Trevor (who won an Oscar in a supporting role). Directed and co-authorud with Richard Brooks by John Huston.

The Last Picture Show (Palace Cinema, West Springfield)
The Best American Film of last year is this depressing, bleak visio.i of life about the coming of age of three youngsters in a small Texas town in 1951. Directed by Peter Bogdanovich, the film is a straightforward well-crafted, well-acted narrative about the perils of growing up in the finest tradition of the great Hollywood directors. The film is nostalgia in the negative sense and despite some near melodramatic plotting is the most poignant film in quite some time. The acting is superb by a cast of mostly unknown character actors led by Cloris Leachmen, Timothy Bottoms, Jeff Bridges, Eileen Brennan, and Ben Johnson. The film won four NY Film Critics awards and finished second in voting for Best Picture behind a Clockwork Orange; an often searing film.

2001: A Space Odyssey

The Loves of Isadora (Friday, Hooker Auditorium, Mt. Holyoke, 8)
The life of Isadora Duncan, the insane, romantic free spirit who was a legend in the early part of the century, is beautifully rendered by Vanessa Redgrave. Otherwise this truncated film is choppy and confusing because of the cuts Warner Brothers found necessary for commercial release.) Karel Reisz often does have his grip on things and is well worth seeing for the magnificent acting of Redgrave.

Made For Each Other (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)
Staring Renee Taylor and Joseph Bologna (Lovers and Other Strangers) the film is a romantic adult comedy of two New Yorkers leading separate lives who decide to run from their routine existences and find fulfillment together in the relaxing solitude of love. Their off-beat relationship and the parental problems arising from different ethnic backgrounds provide the refreshing humor. Directed by Robert Bean.

Medea (Friday, 7:15, 9:30, Sage Hall, Smith College)
A dull and emotionless attempt at a re-creation of the classic story of a powerful and commanding woman, and the many lives she affects. Emphasis here is on the visual aspects of the film, and while some of the cinematic tricks are interesting enough, the movie lacks passion and depth. Directed by Pier Paolo Pasolini and starring Maria Callas.

Midnight Cowboy Saturday, Sage Hall, Smith, 7:30 and 9:30.
John Schlesinger's cinematic version of James Leo Herlihy's gritty and compassionate novel about two of society's misfits who form a touching liaison within the brutally cruel atmosphere of New York City. There are two positively dazzling performances by Dustin Hoffman and Jon Voight, the latter's being the finest film debut in recent memory. The story concerns a stupid lunk of a man who travels to New York to seek his fortune as a hustler for rich women. He quickly learns the streets aren't paved with gold and finds his only relationship is with a lonely, humpback named Rico. Schlesinger can be faulted only in the making of the film a bit too glossy and oversentimental, otherwise his handling of actors and situations makes for a compelling and moving film.

Monterey Pop (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)
A documentary of the 1967 Monterey Pop Festival which is a clamoring feat of live cinematography featuring Ravi Shankar, the Jefferson Airplane, Big Brother and the Holding Co., Janis Joplin, Otis Redding, the Mamas and the Papas, Hugh Masekela and others. Directed by D.A. Pennebaker, the film is a stylistically modern attempt at creating a hip atmosphere, but it often fails to pay strict attention to the performers.

Night of the Living Dead (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)
Not exactly the correct apertif to compliment a heavy meal, pretty scary nonetheless. Looked at more closely on page 13.

The Petrified Forest (Wednesday, Jerry Lewis Cinema, Northampton)
Staring Leslie Howard, Humphrey Bogart and Bette Davis, this 1936 classic is a take-off on Robert Sherwood's play of a man, held captive in a remote inn by a gangster, who gives his life to save the other hostages. Directed by Archie Mayo, the best feature of this film is the acting.

Pocket Money (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)
A boring and worthless film, whose semblance of a plot deals with cattle ranchers in the guise of Paul Newman, Lee Marvin and Strother Martin. The action is slow and directionless, for the most part, with Newman taking a dry and uncreative role. Lee Marvin saves the film, for all that he alone can do to support it, and even Carole King, who wrote and sings the title song, falls flat of her expectations.

Straw Dogs (Campus Cinemas, Hadley, Jerry Lewis Cinemas, Northampton)
Sam Peckinpah's essay on violence finally becomes a celebration of some

Nixon Sees Mao; Disagreement Hinted

PEKING (AP)—President Nixon talked with Mao Tse-tung in an unexpected meeting at the chairman's home Monday only a few hours after beginning his historic visit to China.

There was a hint of disagreement, but later Nixon suggested the United States and China can be friendly.

The hour-long discussion by the President and the Communist chairman was described by the Chinese and the Americans as "frank and serious"-indicating in Communist terminology that the talk ended in fundamental disagreement.

But at a banquet afterward, a warm atmosphere prevailed in contrast to the subdued welcome given Nixon on late morning, and there the President proposed that China and the United States begin a long march toward peace without compromising their principles of communism and capitalism.

Premier Chou En-lai suggested a normalizing of relations despite the great gulf of differences separating this, the world's most populous nation, and the United States, the world's richest.

By coincidence, back home, the United States was observing the birthday of America's first president, George Washington.

"There is no need for us to be enemies," Nixon told the banquet in his honor.

And Chou told Nixon: "The gates to friendly contacts have finally opened."

Nixon went to the home of Mao, the 78-year-old supreme leader of China's communism, for the hour-long talk.

The phrase "frank and serious" was used by White House press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler as well as the official New China News Agency. This indicated both sides had agreed on that description.

The meeting, which came as a surprise so early in the visit, had not been on Nixon's schedule and it delayed a later formal meeting with Chou.

Although Nixon had been expected to see Mao during his week-long visit, no time had been set. There was speculation that the meeting would come at the end of the visit.

At the banquet, it became clear that no matter how far apart Nixon and Mao seemed to be, the United States and Communist China would try in the coming days to end more than 20 years of enmity that began with the Communist takeover of the mainland and carried through the Korean War and the present war in Indochina.

The President and Mrs. Nixon sat with Chou at the banquet and they ate with chopsticks while a Chinese band played Chinese tunes and such American staples as "Turkey in the Straw," "Home on the Range," and "America the Beautiful."

The President had been greeted by Chou at the airport on his arrival in late morning and they met formally in the afternoon after Nixon's talk with Mao.

The premier toasted the Nixons in the Great Hall of the People just off Tien An Men Square-the Square of Heavenly Peace. The toast came after the diners finished off Chinese fare ranging from bamboo shoots to steamed chicken in coconuts.

Chou said the visit afforded an opportunity to normalize relations broken off a generation ago, after the Nationalists of Chiang Kai-shek were routed to the island of Taiwan.

"This is a positive move in conformity with the desire of the American and Chinese people and is an event unprecedented in the relations between the United States and China," the premier declared.

"The American people are a great people. The Chinese people are a great people. The people of our two countries have always been friendly to each other. But owing to reasons known to all, the contacts between the two peoples were suspended for over 20 years.

"Now through the common efforts of China and the United States the gates to friendly contact have finally opened."

Chou acknowledged that fundamental differences exist between Washington and Peking; nevertheless, he suggested normalizing contacts on the basis of five points he himself proposed at a conference of nonaligned Asian nations at Bandung, Indonesia, in 1955.

These points, reiterated by Chou to Nixon, are:

—Mutual respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of nations.
—Mutual nonaggression.
—Noninterference in internal affairs.
—Mutual equality.
—Peaceful coexistence.

"We hope to gain a clearer insight into the American way of thinking," Chou concluded, "and with this a new start can be made in relations between our two countries."

Nixon made no specific proposals at the banquet for new relations but he has said this subject would be one purpose of his visit to China.

The President emphasized a belief that a Chinese-U.S. friendship, in spite of fundamental differences, is necessary for the future of world peace.

"As we discuss our differences, neither of us will compromise principles," Nixon said. "But while we cannot close the gulf between us, we can try to bridge it so that we may be able to talk across it.

"And so let us in these next five days start a long march together. Not in lock step, but on different roads leading to the same goal: a goal of building a world structure of peace and justice in which all may stand together with equal dignity, in which each nation, large or small, has a right to determine its own form of government free of outside interference or domination.

News Analysis

Nixon Moving Fast

(AP)-Things seem to be moving at a brisk pace in Peking.

If he hasn't already, President Nixon probably soon will have a clear picture of what he can and cannot expect from his venture into China.

The President had hardly arrived when he was received by Mao Tse-tung. If the term "serious and frank" used to describe the talk suggested disagreement, that could hardly surprise anybody. What did seem surprising was that the Communist chief met Nixon so soon, in advance of the President's business talks with Chou En-lai.

One explanation could be that the Chinese revolution's father-figure wanted to signify his approval of the idea that some of the 21-year-old barriers between Americans and Chinese should now be leveled. But the Mao-Nixon talk probably was along broad lines, with details left to Mao's able technician, Premier Chou.

What is indicated for the Chou-Nixon talks?

The President can expect that his approach on the summit level in Moscow will be at least complicated by what he is told in Peking.

The President cannot expect help from China on the Vietnam-Indochina entanglement. At the same time, the President may find that the Indochina situation will not necessarily impede developing U.S.—China contacts.

Chou may let the President know that Taiwan, while it has been a formidable issue, is not an insurmountable barrier to Chinese-American relations.

Amherst Candidates Discuss The Issues

By STEVE FINE

Voters in today's Amherst elections had a chance to see the candidates and hear them discuss the issues last Thursday night. Candidates for positions on the Board of Selectmen, the School Committee, the Jones Library Trustees and the redevelopment Authority participated in "Candidate's Night", which was held in Amherst Regional Junior High School and broadcast over cable-TV channel 8.

The presentation was sponsored by the League of Woman Voters and moderated by Don Freeman of WTTT radio. All of the candidates for each position delivered a 2-minute speech on the subject of their choice. A question and answer period followed, with the present audience asking questions from the floor and the viewing audience calling in questions.

Stephen Keedy, Leo Bouchard, Frank Decker and Bob Garvey are the four candidates running for Selectman. There are two 3-year openings on the board.

Keedy, who has served on the board for six years, said that he believed the needs of the community had been met through organized community goals such as land use, and keeping tax levels at an acceptable level.

Bouchard said that he believed environmental protection in Amherst was important and the community should receive support from income taxes on a graduated level. He said that his past activity in Amherst included working on the Citizens Community Advisory Committee, and other organizations involved with community affairs.

Decker, a personnel consultant, said he was willing to devote as much time as the job required since he was retired and added that he foresees no changes needed in Amherst government because it had worked effectively for the last 15 years and was still working effectively now.

Garvey said in his two minutes that since Amherst had grown, people had lost touch with the government, and it was necessary for it to "catch up with the people." He suggested that this could be done by updating the Town Meeting and increasing the number of members on the Board of Selectmen from 5 to 7. He said that although he'd never held a public office, he had been involved in many community activities, particularly in the field of youth services.

Bouchard, said that salaries were important in keeping with the changing Amherst community. "I would prefer to have an expense account, but since state laws prohibits it, I'm in favor of having a salary for selectman," he said.

Decker didn't feel that salaries were necessary, because if selectman were paid, other public positions would have to be paid. He also said that he was in favor of some type of pocket expense reimbursment, with which Garvey concurred, adding that there should not be discrimination against working people running for selectman, or citizens who want to attend selectman meetings. He felt that all selectman meetings should be held in the evening.

Keedy, said that it has been the policy of the board to meet at times convenient for members and the public alike. He also added that no better people would be attracted to the office if pay were offered.

Another question concerned the candidates feeling on preference hiring of state personnel to higher positions, rather than looking for out of staters to fill the position.

Decker said "That if you're going to pay someone a good salary, it should be the best person you can find, whether in state or out of state."

Keedy felt that if an in-stater met the qualifications, he should be promoted over an out of stater, to which Bouchard said that he approved of departmental promotions and felt that more of this was being seen because of incentive pay.

Garvey said he believed the best qualified in or out of state should be hired. He maintained that job descriptions and qualifications should be listed in advance so people in the department will know what the requirements are for it.

Rita Kropf and Katherine Schoenberger, who are running for the 3 year position on the School Committee, spoke next.

In her 2 minute speech, Kropf stressed the need "to take inventory and see where we're going." She said, "We must improve communications between parents and teachers by seeking a better system of grading and reporting to parents." She also said that the school committee should set priorities in the schools by setting guidelines based on the success of past programs.

Schoenberger felt that the School Committee should take more responsibility in reporting to the town, and improving line of communication between parent and teachers. She also said that new teaching methods should be fully evaluated before new programs are instituted in the schools.

Moderator Freedman then introduced Horace Hewlett, one of the candidates in the Jones Library Trustees race. Barbara Carpino, the other candidate wasn't in attendence.

Hewlett said the libraries in Amherst were going under a period of consolidation. He also said that with Amherst's population changing in size, the library will be opened later in the near future.

The Redevelopment Authority candidates had the floor last. They are David Montague, Margaret Roberts, Willard Weeks and Raymond Werbe, who were appointed when it was formed. The other candidate who is running is David Matthews, a UMass student.

Nixon To Get Clear Picture

Chou's banquet toast was intriguing. He used the term "normalization of relations" as a goal of this initial contact. He called the contact a positive move. He noted that "the gates to friendly contact have finally been opened." All this is going a long distance in contrast with what was being said not too long ago.

Chou invoked the 17-year-old "Spirit of Bandung." The spirit was born of an Asian-African conference at Bandung, Indonesia, in 1955 where Chou preached the Asian concept of "panch sila," or five principles, including noninterference and peaceful coexistence. Chou did that at a time when China was weak and had a vested interest in peace.

There may be a connection with today's situation. China's leadership has obviously just undergone a purge, probably triggered by the U.S.—China contact. Powerful Lin Piao, who was to have been Mao's heir, has been eliminated.

China's top leadership all along has had hawks dead set against relaxation of hostility toward the Americans.

On Vietnam, Chou has shown he doesn't even want to discuss the subject, much less take part in any scheme to bring about and secure a peace there.

China has been giving the Vietnamese Communist arms and other aid all along, but Chou's efforts to soothe North Vietnamese misgivings do not appear to have been wholly successful. Hanoi is complaining that Nixon is trying to create trouble for the whole "Socialist camp." This is as if to suggest that Chou and Mao might be misled by "deceptive hypocritical moves of U.S. imperialism's foreign policy."

On Taiwan, Peking seems now to be taking the long view. The leadership has purged those elements who would have obliged Chou to demand of Nixon total withdrawal of the U.S. presence immediately, not only from Taiwan and the Strait, but from Indochina, Thailand, Korea and everywhere else in Asia.

Now the Peking message seems to be that it is taking the long view of Taiwan and the Chiang Kai-shek Nationalist regime there. Chou has said publicly that once Americans leave the island, the Communists and Nationalists in their own good time probably can reach an understanding.

CEQ Elections To To Be Tonight

The Coalition for Environmental Quality (R.S.O. #347) will hold its Annual Meeting at which annual officers are elected tonight at 6:30 in Campus Center Rooms 174-176. There are seven annual officers on the Steering Committee of C.E.Q.; the President, Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, Resource Coordinator, Projects Coordinator, and Outreach Coordinator. The first four have usual duties associated with their titles.

The Resource Coordinator is responsible for ordering books and magazines to keep the group informed and up-to-date concerning environmental issues. In addition, the Resource Coordinator is responsible for the office and the extensive files on environmental issues maintained by C.E.Q.

The Projects Coordinator has rather unique duties. In addition to keeping track of the projects; encouraging them, and helping in any way possible, he or she calls and chairs the monthly Project Conferences which can elect up to six Project Delegates who become full voting officers of the Steering Committee until the next Project Conference.

The Outreach Coordinator is responsible for C.E.Q. relations with other environmental organizations and for assistance to any project that involves inter-organizational activities.

All these offices are open to nomination and election by any UMass student. C.E.Q. has no "official" membership, any student can attend, run and vote. Self-nominations will be accepted from the floor during the meeting. At the end of the regular business meeting there may be movies.

Several officers are not running, so vacancies will provide a better chance for new people to get elected. The Project Coordinator Alan Eaton won't be at UMass next semester and will not run for any office. The Secretary's office was created by Constitutional amendment last semester and therefore is presently vacant. The President, Frank Olbris will not be running again–feeling the office should rotate. The Resource Coordinator Richard Smarden will not be running for any office. The other officers probably will run for some office again.

Since C.E.Q. was founded in the Spring of 1970, '70-'71 was the first full year of operation and was somewhat chaotic with little role definition or tradition to guide officers. This is the second year of its existence and it appears that a depth of leadership and a healthy amount of officer turnover is seasoning the organization.

In a similar manner, the environment movement seems to be getting down to the more structural and comprehensive task of bringing the environmentalist ethic to bear on many local, regional, national, and international processes. Wide ranging, intricate, and socially sensative issues are now demanding a different type of commitment to ecology questions. The early optimism and fervor of Earth Day 1970 has faded and the nitty gritty of building a broad and effective movement to sustain effectiveness remains. The foregoing of a public commitment to environmental ethics is continuing and in microcosm, here at UMass, the quality and commitment of students developing leadership and expertise by working in the University community will be an indicator of the future effectiveness of the movement.

Children Of God Face Backlash

SAN DIEGO, Calif. (AP)-A group of worried parents have launched a campaign to bring home the sons and daughters who have joined the fundamentalist Children of God.

"We're trying to separate them from whatever influence causes them to do this," says retired Navy Lt. Cmdr. William Rambur, one of 100 parents who have organized.

"We're convinced they're victims of some form of mind manipulation or why else their sudden change of behavior, wanting to destroy our institutions, not knowing or wanting us?"

During its first convention here last weekend, the Parents Committee to Free Our Sons and Daughters make plans to circulate petitions to bring public pressure on the Bible sect.

Many of those who formed the parents committee over the weekend charge that the leaders of the Children of God have brainwashed their offspring and keep them against their will. Most members of the radical religious group are in their late teens and early 20s and forsake all worldly possession to follow Jesus.

Officials of the Children of God were not available for comment on the parents committee. However, in the past sect leaders have denied charges that they hold members against their wills.

Some members of the sect were sent home last Thanksgiving in what Children of God leaders described as an effort to counter parents' charges against the group.

Lewis Ingersoll, a leader of the Dallas, Tex., Children of God colony, said the Thanksgiving visits were designed to "disprove some of the malicious lies spread by the parents" that young people were coerced to remain in the sect's colonies.

Six former Children of God related their experiences to parents at the San Diego meeting and one of them, Linda Train, said that about 400 of the young people who returned to their homes last Thanksgiving did not go back to Children of God colonies.

Miss Train, a 23-year-old New York City bookkeeper, said those still with the group may not be able to think for themselves.

"When I was a member of the Children of God, I would feel one way but when I opened my mouth to speak, the opposite meaning would come out.

"I had eaten rotten food and hadn't bathed in two weeks, yet I told another member that I had never been happier.

"When I said that, I thought to myself, 'Why am I saying that? I'm miserable.'"

At prayer meetings, she said, "It began with the leader saying 'Everybody hate their parents' and we would shout back, Amen'."

Rambur-who said his daughter, Kay Robb, a 22-year-old registered nurse, vanished with the group last July-says a plan is being worked out to take legal action against the sect.

$6,000 Pizza Table

By JOHN DONNELLY

If you have ever walked from the Campus Center to the Student Union you may have noticed a very large Granite Table in the back of the Hatch, used to make Pizza pies. This table is one third of a larger table, valued at $18,000.00.

The Table was originally incorporated into the design of the Campus Center, and was located in a meeting room on the eleventh floor of the building. In about three months the five by fifteen foot granite slab was removed. The table was said to be impractical; the meeting room could hold about 30 people with the table, and the number was almost doubled without it.

Two of the three sections were put in storage for possible future use, and one section was given to the Hatch as a convenient solution to the new Health Laws. Mr. Warren T. Grinnan expounded on this by saying, "We can't use wood in the Hatch because microorganisms might grow in the cracks." He continued, "They would have bought a granite table anyway....We're just trying to utilize the impractical items which came with the (Campus Center) building." The other sections are still in storage, and may stay there if we don't start buying more Pizza's.

S.O.S. To Meet Tonight

The second open organizational meeting of Students Offering Support (SOS) will take place tonight in Room 175 of the Campus Center at 7:30.

SOS, formed only two weeks ago, will provide a means of expressing support and obtaining funds for the Belchertown State School class action suit. The suit should be brought to trial within the next two weeks.

The suit, filed by 28 parents in U.S. District Court, charges that the State Department of Mental Health has been negligent in the care of patients at the school.

It is expected that the legal cost in taking this case to court will be outstanding and that the case could possibly be drawn out by the state in order to drain the funds of the parents directly involved in the case.

The latest reports out of Boston indicate that the state may appeal a federal judge's earlier decision, and in doing so attempt to have the case thrown out of court. If the state does take this case to the U.S. Court of Appeals and has the previous decision reversed, the 28 parents are fully prepared to take the case to the U.S. Supreme Court which would entail a huge increase in expenses.

If the state ultimately wins this case it will only be because the necessary funds were not made available to the parents. It is also true that if the parents lose this case the inhumane conditions and unjust policies which now exist at the Belchertown State School will never change.

Chairman Joe Sylvia-a UMass graduate student and former employer at the Belchertown School-announced the formation of an executive committee within SOS. Members of the committee will include Sylvia, Professor Henry B. Pierce, UMass faculty member, Jim Gold, Editor-inChief of the Collegian, and Lee Sandwen, president of the Student Senate.

Sylvia said SOS has begun to take on a state-wide look in that 40 colleges in Massachusetts have been contacted. He said student leaders within these colleges have been asked to lend their support to SOS and to use their influence in organizing their own SOS on campus.

Sylvia also said that the kick-off of SOS's fund-raising drive will begin this Thursday. The exact details of the drive will be discussed at tonight's meeting, he said.

Fac-Sen Commission To Discuss Calendar In Open Meeting Today

Students, faculty and staff often have complaints about the way the academic calendar is set up. Gripes are often heard regarding Thursdays becoming Mondays, with Wednesdays being cancelled altogether, etc.

The Faculty Senate has a committee that establishes the annual calendar, the Space & Calendar Commission. This group consisting of 5 faculty members, 3 undergraduates, 2 graduates, and the Scheduling Officer, recommends to the Faculty Senate that it should adopt a certain calendar that the committee feels will most be benefit to the Univesity community as a whole.

Under Faculty Senate Pres., Prof. David Booth, who was last year's chairman, the calendar which will go into effect next year was introduced and passed by the Faculty Senate. Next year's calendar will have classes begin after Labor Day and terminate before Xmas. There will then be a 4 week lag (in which students and faculty can partake in 5 College programs), and the spring semester will be similar to those now in effect.

This year's committee, chaired by undergraduate Student Senate Vice-President John Hogan, will be considering calendars for the next three years. The reason for this is to establish some definite plans for the future, so that continuing education, the Campus Center, the Fine Arts Council, Student Activities, and athletics can determine some firm advance dates, without fear of cancellation.

The other task that the committee has is to maintain a space policy for the academic buildings on campus.

Both of these topics will be discussed today at the group's meeting, room 911-915 CC at 4 p.m.

Any interested parties are urged to attend to voice their preferences or complaints.

5% A Quorum

By JEANNETTE MARTINEAU

Last night's Senior Committee Meeting, chaired by Margie Davis, focused on Senior Day, tentatively set for May 26, from 12 a.m. to 8 p.m. in the Quad.

The Committee is also considering a contribution of books to the new library as the Class Gift. Alternatives to this idea include reading room in the new library and a freshman, junior or grad student scholarship.

Amendments to the Senior Committee Constitution which were ratified included a change in attendance requirements for membership, from two out of three meetings to one out of two. And .5% of the Senior class, rather than 1% (i.e. 15 seniors rather than 30) is now considered a quorum.

A selection committee was also established to chose two juniors to be non-voting members of the Commencement Task Force. These students would become members of the Senior Committee for the Class of '73 in April, and would retain membership in next year's Tast Force with voting privileges.

The next Senior Committee meeting is scheduled for Sunday, February 27, at 7 o'clock, in the Student Activities area.

Johnson Appointed College President

By MICHAEL PATTERSON

Dr. Lawrence Johnson, former director of the CCEBS program, and Assistant Dean of the School of Business Administration, has been appointed the first president of Franklin Park Community College in Roxbury.

A committee of faculty, staff, and students, under the leadership of Al Key, is currently searching for a new director for the CCEBS program.

Dr. Johnson, a former resident of Roxbury, received his bachelors and masters degrees at Boston University, and was awarded his doctorate in 1970 at Stanford University.

Prior to joining the faculty here in 1961, he taught at San Francisco State, North Carolina, and Arkansas A. and M.

He was the founder of the Committee for Collegiate Education of Black Students and served as its director on this campus.

The new community college will have programs leading to a 2 year degree in Medical and Dental Technology, Business Administration, Arts and Sciences, and Secretarial studies.

The college will not only enroll high school graduates but will also have a program for dropouts from the Roxbury community.

"Here She Comes..."

Miss America, Laurie Lea Schaefer, will be the keynote speaker at the Miss Northampton Kick-Off Luncheon to be held Friday, March 3, 12:30 p.m., at the Hotel Northampton.

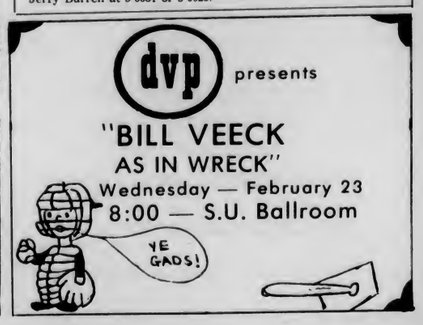
The luncheon will also feature Miss Massachusetts, Deborah Ann O'Brien, and Easthampton's Junior Miss. The day long festivities will culminate with the crowning of Miss Northampton later that evening.

This is the first time in recent history that Miss American has visited Massachusetts and presided over a local pageant.

Miss Schaefer's luncheon theme will be, "What Miss America Means to Me and to Your Community." The Miss America national organization has awarded more scholarships to young women than any other organization in the world.

Reservations for the luncheon will be on a limited basis (250 people) and the price per person will be $3.50. Tickets may be obtained by calling 584-1900.

Trustees



This Wednesday's meeting of the Board of Trustees has been changed from The Old Mill in Westminster to the Saltenstall Building in Boston. The Saltenstall Bld., sometimes referred to as the State Office Bld., is located on Cambrdige Street. The meeting will be held in rooms 2105 and 2106 at 2:00 P.M.

Minority Group Pre-Law Meeting

On Tuesday, February 22 in 114 New Africa House, there will be a pre-law meeting for all minority students on campus. The focus of the meeting will be to make students aware of the opportunities available for legal training throughout the country, the best application procedures to use, undergraduate courses that may facilitate admission, and the place of the legal system in the lives of minority peoples. Freshmen, sophomores, and juniors are especially urged to attend. For more information you may call Jerry Burrell at 5-0031 or 5-0026.

West Coast Longshoremen Head Back To Docks

SAN FRANCISCO (AP)-West Coast longshoremen went back to work in force at premium holiday pay Monday to mark the end of a 134-day dock strike, the longest tieup ever in American mainland ports.

The 24 long-closed Pacific ports bustled with action at the same hour that President Nixon symbolically signed in Peking legislation to stop the already-ended strike.

Some of the men who jammed union hiring halls got no immediate job assignments. "The only problem is there's not enough work yet," said the dispatcher at Los Angeles Local 13.

"We have the men, but not enough ships." He said 600 men were in 100 work gangs handling cargo on 36 ships and asserted there would be more jobs as additional ships tie up later in the week in the Los Angeles-Long Beach port.

At the strike's end, 218 vessels were waiting in ports from Bellingham, Wash., to San Diego in Southern California.

Cost of the strike was estimated recently by Nixon at $23.5 million daily in lost business. That would place total cost well over $2 billion.

Longshoremen went to work with a 72-cent pay increase to $5 an hour. The first day back also brought premium time-and-a-half wages because of the Washington's Birthday holiday.

The 13,000 striking International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union members ratified their new contract with the Pacific Maritime Association Saturday by an overwhelming 71 per cent majority.

The President's signing action in the Chinese capital - at 7 a.m. Pacific time-was disclosed at a Washington news conference by Secretary of Labor James D. Hodgson.

Hodgson called it a largely symbolic act and said: "Unless unknown or unexpected developments occur it will have no force and effect."

In a statement transmitted from Peking, Nixon renewed his call for legislation to prevent future transportation shutdowns.

Nixon said he had delayed the signing in the hope that the measure to end the strike by arbitration would encourage voluntary accord.

The newly ratified dock agreement provides a $1.12 hourly wage increase, a 34 per cent boost, in a span expiring July 1, 1973.

The 72-cent boost to $5 an hour is retroactive to Dec. 25, 1971. Another increase to $5.40 starts July 1, 1972.

The contract still is subject to Pay Board approval. Under the contract the ILWU will be free to resume its strike if the Pay Board refuses.

The contract also includes a guarantee of 36 hours weekly pay for more than 9,000 fulltime longshoremen and clerks and 18 hours weekly pay for more than 4,000 part-time workers.

Wallace Predicts Maryland Win

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS - Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama predicts he will win the Democratic presidential primary in Maryland, but says he might make another third-party campaign for the White House if Democrats scorn him at their national convention.

Meanwhile, the North Carolina Board of Elections nominated 10 Democrats, including Wallace, and three Republicans for the state's first presidential primary May 6. The board voted Monday to exclude Sen. Edward Kennedy, D—Mass., because he has publicly declared himself out of the 1972 presidential race.

Wallace told a news conference in Annapolis, Md., Monday that with 10 to 12 candidates likely to be on the Maryland ballot May 16 "we expect to win this primary."

He denied that he has made a deal with anyone to forego a third party presidential candidacy in 1972. "Let's cross a lot of bridges when we come to them. I might get to Miami Beach and they throw me through the rooftop. That might make me mad, that might hurt my feelings. There's nothing worse than a politician scorned," he said.

The news conference was held prior to a caucus Democratic governors held in Annapolis on the eve on the National Governors Conference starting Tuesday in Washington.

Gov. Marvin Mandel of Maryland, chairman of the caucus, said it is too early to predict how candidates will fare in his state's primary, which will award 53 delegates to the Democratic National Convention.

Each of the persons nominated for the North Carolina primary has until March 6 to notify the elections board if he wants his name on the ballot and to pay a $1,000 filing fee.

Democrats chosen for the primary, in addition to Wallace, were: Sens. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota, Henry M. Jackson of Washington, and George S. McGovern of South Dakota, former Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills of Arkansas, Rep. Shirley Chisholm of New York, former North Carolina Gov. Terry Sanford and New York Mayor John V. Lindsay.

Republicans nominated by the North Carolina board were President Nixon, Rep. Paul McCloskey of California and Rep. John Ashbrook of Ohio.

North Carolina's delegate votes at the national conventions will be divided on the first ballot on a pro rata basis among the top four vote getters in each primary.

Joe Kennedy Aboard Hi-jacked Plane

BULLETIN--NEW DELHI (AP) - The hijacked West German airliner with Joseph P. Kennedy III aboard landed safely Tuesday at Aden, at the southern end of the Arabian peninsula, a spokesman for the airline announced.

NEW DELHI (AP) — A West German jumbo jet carrying Joseph P. Kennedy III, 19-year-old son of the late Sen Robert F. Kennedy, was hijacked early Tuesday an hour out of New Delhi. Officials said the plan was located later over the Persian Gulf island of Bahrain, but its final destination was unknown.

A Lufthansa official said an unknown person or persons commandeered the plane about an hour after it took off from New Delhi for Athens with 179 aboard. Bombay air control authorities said they received this message from the plane:

"Call us victorious Jidda. If you call us Lufthansa, we won't answer you."

It was not known what the word Jidda referred to. There is a Jidda, Saudi Arabia, which is the port of entry for millions of Moslems visiting the holy city of Mecca.

The plane, Lufthansa Flight 649, left New Delhi at 1 a.m. Tuesday--2:30 p.m. EST Monday. It carried 175 passengers and four crew, airport sources said, and had enough fuel to fly for 11 hours--until 1:30 a.m. EST.

Joseph Kennedy had been on vacation in India for the past week after accompanying his uncle, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Mrs. Kennedy to Bangladesh.

Mrs. Kennedy also visited India last week but had left the country and was not on the Lufthansa flight, authoritative sources said. Joseph had stayed in India for sightseeing.

The original flight plan would have put the hijacking scene at about 100 miles south of Karachi, Pakistan. "The pilot messaged us that he no longer was in command," a Lufthansa official said.

The flight originated in Tokyo and stopped in Hong Kong and Bangkok en route to New Delhi. It was due to fly to a termination point in Frankfurt after Athens.

The hijacking is the first involving an international airline from New Delhi. An Indian airline Fokker Friendship was hijacked from Kashmir in January, 1971, to Lahore in Pakistan.

Joseph is one of 11 children of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, who was assassinated in Los Angeles in June, 1968. The young Kennedy is named for his late grandfather, financier partriarch of the Kennedy clan who once served as U.S. ambassador to Britain.

Young Joseph's mother, Ethel Kennedy, spent the night before his birth campaigning for his uncle, John F. Kennedy was elected president and his father appointed attorney general. His father was elected senator from New York when Joseph was 12.

The young Kennedy has always been a sports enthusiast, but has not always had the best of luck. He was struck by a boom while sailing in 1965, broke a leg skiing at Sun Valley the following year and got a minor gash in the head while trying his hand at bullfighting in 1968.

Cardinal Tisserant Dies

VATICAN CITY (AP)-Eugene Cardinal Tisserant, dean of the College of Cardinals, died at a lakeside retreat Monday at the end of a long and colorful career in the service of the Vatican.

The 87-year-old French cardinal suffered from a lingering illness. He stepped down from active duty in the Curia last March, but Pope Paul VI named him Vatican librarian emeritus "as proof of our perennial affection."

As dean of the sacred college, Cardinal Tisserant directed the conclaves that elected Pope Paul and his predecessor, Pope John XXIII. The outspoken French churchman issued an on-the-spot excommunication to a group of overenthusiastic priests at the gathering that elected Pope John.

Just after announcement of the election, the priests broke through barriers at the Apostalic Palace before the strict conclave secrecy was officially lifted.

Cardinal Tisserant, walking along a palace corridor, spotted them and shouted: "Excommunicated!" But Pope John immediately lifted the excommunication when he learned of the episode.

In his ecclesiastical carrer Cardinal Tisserant retained something of the military snap he took on while serving with French intelligence in Palestine during World War I.

Cardinal Tisserant served as president of the first session of the Vatican Ecumenical Council. He was one of the strongest exponents of putting church services into commonly spoken languages instead of Latin and made a speech in favor of this change early in the first session. This tack angered New York's Francis Cardinal Spellman and others of conservative bent.

The Cardinal was consecrated a bishop in 1937 and elevated to the purple by Pope Pius XI in 1936.

As dean of the College of Cardinals Cardinal Tisserant accompanied Pope Paul to the Holy Land, Asia, the United Nations, Latin America and Australia.

The Pope was informed immediately of his death and retired to his private chapel to pray for Cardinal Tisserant's soul.

Senate Confirms Peterson

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate confirmed Monday the nomination of Peter G. Peterson as Secretary of Commerce, succeeding Maurice H. Stans.

Peterson, former head of Bell & Howell Co., Chicago, has been serving as a special adviser to President Nixon on international trade.

Assassination Attempt

LONDON (AP) — Gen. Abdul Razak al-Naef, former premier of Iraq, escaped an assassination attempt in London today but his wife was shot.

Two men burst into the general's London home and opened fire. His wife threw herself between him and the gunmen and was wounded twice in the shoulder. Doctors performed an emergency operation.

Naef was named to head a 27-member coalition government of nationalists after an army coup July 17.

Soviet Moon Probe Lands

BOCHUM, Germany (AP) — The West Germany space observatory reported the Soviet moon probe Luna 20 made a soft landing Monday on the sunlit lunar surface.

Director Heinz Kaminski said it was almost certain from picture transmissions monitored that the craft carried a vehicle to explore the surface. He had no immediate details.

Luna 20 was launched last Monday.

VC Attacks Renewed Across S. Vietnam

SAIGON (AP) — Enemy forces launched intensified small attacks against U.S. installations and South Vietnamese forces across the country Monday as President Nixon began his visit to China.

Some observers saw the stepped-up enemy ground activity as an attempt to discredit the Nixon administration's Vietnamization and pacification programs while the President meets with Chinese leaders.

Most of the thrusts were aimed at South Vietnamese militia and home guard units, which provide security for towns, hamlets and government offices in rural areas.

The increased attacks began Saturday, about a day after the Viet Cong's unilateral 96-hour cease-fire for the lunar new year ended.

The U.S. Command announced that B52 bombers flew nine missions across South Vietnam, eight of them against a Communist base camp and staging area 20-25 miles south of the port city of Da Nang.

The U.S. Command added that American troop strength in South Vietnam dropped to 127,100 this week from 131,200 in the previous reporting period.

South Vietnamese forces also took the offensive Monday on an operation 100 miles south of Da Nang and another near Fire Base 5 in the Central Highlands.

Associated Press correspondent Holger Jensen reported from Da Nang that South Vietnamese border rangers smashed a North Vietnamese-Viet Cong base camp in a surprise raid south of Da Nang.

According to South Vietnamese officers, 62 enemy soldiers were killed in the attack and the Saigon forces suffered two wounded.

In a report from Pleiku in the central highlands, Associated Press correspondent Richard Blystone said hundreds of South Vietnamese infantrymen were ferried by helicopters to an area near Fire Base 5 to search for enemy troops.

U.S. B52 bombers struck the area before the troops were brought in. Small skirmishes were reported in the area of the fire base over the weekend.

Informer Reportedly Thwarts Kidnap Plot

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP) — The government claimed Monday that a plot to kidnap presidential aide Henry Kissinger was thwarted because a fellow prisoner, recruited as a courier by the Rev. Philip Berrigan, turned FBI informer.

The defense at the Harrisburg 7 trial responded by labeling the informer a liar and an "agent provocateur." The defense also said federal antiwar conspiracy charges against Berrigan and six co-defendants were false and were lodged "to stop a movement, to silence people and to support something J. Edgar Hoover had done."

Seeking additional funds from the Senate for the FBI, Hoover first publicly reported the alleged conspiracy on Nov. 27, 1970, more than seven weeks before Berrigan and the others were indicted.

The mention of Hoover came from his onetime boss, former Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark.

During the day Clark was fired by Berrigan as the latter's attorney.

Confirming this, Clark told newsmen: "The court has not released me."

Thus, he remained the attorney, of record at least, for the antiwar priest, described by the government as mastermind of the purported plot to kidnap Kissinger, blow up government property and destroy draft records.

Berrigan sought the right to circimvent Clark as his lawyer in order to make a personal opening statement to match the government's trial-opening remarks by Deputy Asst. Atty. Gen. William Lynch, another onetime aide to Clark.

An 18-page statement had been prepared by Berrigan but he never got to read it. U.S. District Court Judge R. Dixon Herman ruled that only a lawyer could speak for him.

The angular, 6-foot-3 Clark eventually made an opening statement in response to Lynch-but he did so in the name of another defendant whom he represented, not Berrigan.

Clark sought to dismiss Kissinger's involvement in the case by telling the nine women and three men on the jury: "Of course you know Henry Kissinger was not kidnapped. He is alive and well and in Peking today, as far as we know."

Clark went on: "The evidence will show that the government's charges are false. There was no conspiracy. There was no agreement."

Earlier, Lynch told the jury that Berrigan's prison courier became an FBI informer, and revealed a plot by the seven defendants to kidnap Kissinger.

The FBI informer, Boyd Douglas, Jr., was serving time at Lewisburg Federal Pentitentiary when Berrigan arrived in mid-April 1970 to begin a six-year term for destroying draft records.

Douglas was allowed in and out of the prison under an educational program for convicts. Lynch said Douglas was recruited as a courier by Berrigan and subsequently advised to be on the lookout for "a very hot letter."

"In this letter the proposal to kidnap Henry Kissinger was made," said Lynch in his 51-minute opening statement.

"Boyd Douglas was advised that under no circumstances was it to fall into the wrong hands," Lynch said.

Referring to two other defendants, the prosecutor declared:

"Sister Elizabeth McAlister set up a telephone call from Eqbal Ahmad. Mr. Ahmad called Boyd Douglas and advised him he was aware of the contents of the letter and very much interested in having Philip Berrigan's views...on the plan as proposed. The plan as proposed was simply to kidnap Mr. Kissinger."

Lynch said Douglas made a copy of the letter which he smuggled to Berrigan inside the prison.

World Comments On Nixon Trip Varied

(AP) — The Soviet Union mentioned it briefly and North Vietnam ignored the event Monday, but elsewhere President Nixon's first meetings with China's Communist leaders captured headlines around the world.

In Japan there were expressions of regret that a Japanese leaders didn't get to Peking first, while in Poland Communist boss Edward Gierek chose the occasion to issue what amounted to a call for the overthrow of Mao Tse-tung's leadership.

Tokyo's early editions Tuesday carried front-page pictures of Nixon greeting Chou En-lai. The Japan Times said in an editorial the significance of the events now unfolding in Peking "is that an opening has been made for a continuing dialogue."

The paper said "lines of communication will most likely be established even if nothing else is achieved," and this could be useful "to other nations in sizing up the Chinese intentions now and in the future."

Japanese officials were reported concerned that the Peking talks might leave Japan on the sidelines of future international developments.

Tass, the Soviet Union's official news agency, reported Nixon's meeting with the Chinese leaders in a three- sentence dispatch.

But the agency reflected official displeasure at the trip by carrying a commentary from the French Communist newspaper, L'Humanite, assailing the Nixon visit as aimed at taking advantage of the break between China's leaders and international communism.

Nationalist China reaffirmed its previously expressed opposition to Nixon's trip in a resolution passed by the National Assembly charging that it has "deeply damaged the Chinese national rights and interests."

With this vehicle blocking one of the several specially marked ramps on campus, a handicapped person has a problem getting by. Cars and non-motorized cycles are also often parked in such places. Handicapped students, faculty members, and staff personnel would appreciate it if others in the UMass community would leave the ramps free days and nights for wheelchairs and electric carts.

Handicapped Victims Of Parking

People who don't realize what they are doing are making life harder for the University's handicapped staff and students.

They park their cars in lots restricted to the handicapped, or in front of ramps which the handicapped must use to get over curbs.

And during bicycle season they chain their two-wheelers to concret posts at the ramps, blocking the passage for those who must use three or four-wheelers--electric carts or wheelchairs--or crutches or braces. If you ride a bicycle, or a wheelchair, you're probably familiar with those popular "hitching posts", the red ones with the sign attached saying NO PARKING...HANDICAPPED RAMP...TOW ZONE.

A cerebral palsied graduate student, Miss Marie Desmond, says the lack of a parking space or the obstruction of a ramp "throws the handicapped person off schedule, to say nothing of what it does to his temper." A librarian in the graduate English department, Miss Desmond drives an electric carts three to five miles daily around campus and to her home on Sunset Ave.

She says, "A delay of 10 minutes can cheat me of something--like swimming, which I need very much."

Two ramps which Miss Desmond has several times found blocked are those at the northeast corner of the parking lot alongside Whitmore, and the path to the Student Union near the bus stop on North Pleasant St.

Miss Desmond says the campus is now about 85% "ramped" and will be 90 to 95% "ramped" by September. Last summer she published a guide for the handicapped, describing the accessibility of campus buildings. The guide may be obtained at the information desk on the concourse of the Campus Center.

According to Miss Desmond, the physical plant staff plans to paint the ramps white this spring, and it may place stencils of a wheelchair on the ramp signs, in an effort to remind people not to block the passages.

Pleased with what the physical plant has done to make the campus more accessible to the "mobility disadvantaged," Miss Desmond, and all those who depend on crutches, braces, wheelchairs, and carts, hope that students, faculty, staff and visitors will cooperate in keeping the ramps open.

Belfast Bombing Backfires

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) — Four suspected guerrillas accidentally blew themselves up in a ball of flame Monday during an apparent attempt to sneak a bomb into battle-scarred Belfast.

They died when their car exploded into fire on a main highway about two miles southeast of the provincial capital. In the tangled wreckage were two revolvers of a type favored by the illegal Irish Republican Army, policesaid.

The explosion shattered windows in nearby homes.

The four were believed victims of a 20-pound gelignite bomb destined for Belfast, where two guerrillas earlier blew up a downtown gas station, injuring several persons.

A cab driver 100 yards away said: "My car was lifted off the ground but then just rolled on."

The four bodies were blasted beyond immediate recognition.

Thousands of troops and police went on immediate alert in Belfast in case the bomb should herald a return to the IRA's offensive against the capital. The guerrillas are trying to force the British out of predominantly Protestant Northern Ireland and unite it with the overwhelmingly Roman Catholic Irish republic.

A fifth apparently self-inflicted IRA fatality was discovered when police stopped a hearse at Banbridge, south of the capital, and opened a coffin carrying the body of 14-year-old David McAuley.

Police said the coffin was accompanied by a death certificate signed by a physician in Dundalk that the boy had died from a noninfectious disease. An autopsy in Belfast showed he had been shot in the stomach, they added.

An IRA source in Dundalk said the boy was shot accidentally. Police belive he was accidentally shot during weapons training with an IRA auxiliary.

His death and those of the four in the car brought Northern Ireland's 2-1/2-year toll of religious-political violence to 251 dead, 45 of them this year alone.

Lord Chief Justice Widgery, Britain's top judge, opened his inquiry into the Jan. 30 "Bloody Sunday" deaths of 13 Londonderry civilians slain in a clash between rioters and paratroopers.

In the hearing at Coleraine, about 25 miles from Londonderry, the judge was told the troops fired 103 rounds in 18 minutes. The army denied charges from local Catholics that the soldiers indiscriminately fired at unarmed civilians. It said the paratroopers aimed only at guerrillas who attacked them first.

Admissions Halted At State School In N.Y.

ALBANY—Willowbrook State School for the mentally retarded, the focus of repeated public furor over its overcrowding and innate neglect, is no longer accepting new patients.

An indefinite freeze on admissions has been ordered at the Staten Island institution to reduce the present population of 5,100 patients to 3,000.

While dealing with this severe trouble spot, however, state officials say their plan to open more than 500 beds now available in newly renovated, smaller neighborhood centers in the city has been blocked by lack of state funds for hiring staff workers.

Meanwhile, troubled families continue to make 40 to 50 applications a month, despite Gothic-like tales of severely retarded children left untended in filth. One desperate man recently threatened to kill his child and himself unless the state found room for the child, according to Dr. Jack Hammond, director of Willowbrook.

Emergency Cases Sent Away

Even emergency cases that used to go to Willowbrook are being sent, instead, to institutions outside the city after screening and review by the office of Dr. Frederic Grunberg, the state deputy commissioner of mental health in charge of mental retardation.

Dr. Grunberg said today that the waiting list for Willowbrook at the time the freeze was ordered last month totaled about 1,600 children, but of these he estimated that perhaps 500 were in true need of institutionalization, with the rest more suited to other kinds of care where available. Last year, Willowbrook accepted close to 300 new patients.

Willowbrook's "protective wall," as one official referred to the freeze, was ordered at a time when budget economies by the Legislature and Governor Rockefeller had cut the institution's staff by 633 workers in the last 14 months, and frozen 279 other vacancies.

The present staff numbers 2,700, with several hundred more due to be hired under a $5-million appropriation made last month by Governor Rockefeller following publicity about conditions at Willowbrook.

Dr. Grunberg said that 1,200 new workers were needed but not budgeted for, as staff for four new centers renovated as part of the department's plan to relate treatment facilities more closely to local neighborhoods. One center, a renovated motel on 114th Street, Corona, Queens, is open but has staff people for only 50 of its capacity of 200 beds, he said.

The others which are ready but unused, are a 300-bed facility on Morton Street, Manhattan, and an 80-bed converted former yeshiva on South Second Street, in the Williamsburgh section of Brooklyn.

For the second year in a row, money is particularly right in Albany and the competition is strong, even within the mental health field.

Dr. Hammond, Willowbrook's director, estimates that if enough such alternatives as special home and hostel care were available, about one-sixth of the institution's present population might be released. Letters were sent to the parents of 4,930 patients in December, 1970, asking whether any of them might be able to take their children back home because of the overcrowding, Dr. Hammond said. There were 24 replies, he said, and "one or two" children went home.

It would be unfair to criticize such parents, Dr. Hammond added, because the mentally retarded child who is overactive day and night can make a home a "shambles."

Parent groups, in turn, criticize the state for not providing enough funds for alternative forms of care and for allegedly emphasizing supervisory personnel over basic-care attendants.

FBI To Investigate Extradition Case

CLAYTON, Mo. (AP) — Federal authorities will be asked to investigate the handling of an extradition case involving a former St. Louis man accused of robbery, rape and attempted murder in 1968, St. Louis County Prosecuting Atty. Gene McNary said Monday.

McNary, at a news conference, contended civil rights of the woman Albert Bradford was accused of attacking are being violated by failure of Massachusetts authorities to bring him under arrest.

Massachusetts Gov. Francis Sargent, in response to a second request from McNary, signed extradition papers last week that would have authorized the return of Bradford to face the Missouri charges.

But Bradford, who has assumed the name of Malik Hakim as an antipovery worker in Boston's Roxbury section, went into hiding before he could be arrested.

McNary said circumstances he wants investigated include why Sargent took six months to sign extradition papers and why Boston Police did not arrest the suspect pending the signing.

By notifying Bradford's attorney the extradition papers had been signed, McNary contended, Massachusetts authorities had done what was "tantamount to notifying Bradford he had few hours to escape."

Belchertown School - A Look Inside

Editor's Note: The horrifying and inhumane conditions which exist at Belchertown State School for the retarded have always existed, and in recent years have been brought to light by newspaper articles and legislative commissions. But, the most despicable aspect of Belchertown is that on the most part conditions at Belchertown have not changed, which is why the Collegian is reprinting this series.

The "Tragedy of Belchertown" was printed in the Springfield Union two years ago. Despite the reforms which are continually cited at the School, the staff is still undermanned, and many of the residents are still forced to live like animals.

The photographs which are used in the series were also taken two years ago, but every scene depicted in the photographs may be observed at Belchertown today.

Buildings A and K--the infamous backwards--which are mentioned in the series have changed. Building A has been changed into a recreation building while slight changes have taken place in Building K.)

By JAMES M. SHANKS
First of a Series

It is not uncommon to see a group of men sitting around in the nude at the Belchertown State School for the retarded. The main problem at Belchertown has long been the lack of attendants to work with residents. (Photo by Vinnie D'Addario)

Fifty years ago Massachusetts had the reputation of being one of the most progressive states in the nation dealing with mental retardation. It operated according to the best and most progressive thinking in the field.

Today the state continues to operate according to those same theories. But the theories are now regarded as outmoded and inhumane in the treatment of the mentally retarded.

The retarded are treated essentially as "surplus citizens." These are people the technological era has passed by. They are ignored by the legislature, forgotten by the public, and sometimes still closeted by their families...in this day of supposed enlightenment.

The retarded can't continue to be ignored. Three of every 100 born are retarded. More than six million retarded individuals are now living in the United States.

That's the equivalent of a city larger than Los Angeles, or nearly a dozen times larger than Boston.

Seven thousand retarded call Western Massachusetts home. About one-third of these need some kind of assistance from the community or state at any time--early diagnosis centers, nursery schools, day care centers, special classes in school, vocational training, sheltered workshops or group living centers.

Few, unfortunately, receive the help they need. The retarded have another great need: to be treated as human beings, people, instead of freaks or subhuman "things" incapable of thinking or feeling. Yet, the need is more often unmet than not.

A retarded person generally and simply is defined as one with an I.Q. of below 75 who has difficulty, great or small, in coping with his surroundings and every day functioning life.

Retardation can range from a small mental deficiency to severe mongolism or brain damage. An adult body can be left with the capabilities of a child of two.

Starting about 1900, the state looked at the mental retardation problem. Four residential schools were planned and built. Each was considered a model of its time. All were solidly built. Few expenses were spared for bricks, mortar or landscaping for the grounds.

The Juke-Kalikak theory of retardation was in vogue then.

Retardation, or "feeble-mindedness" was caused primarily by defective heredity and inbreeding, the theory noted. Society had to be protected from such people.

The Belchertown State School for the Feeble Minded was the result. Solidly built "14 miles from anywhere" in isolation, the men and women were segregated to prevent any sexual contact.

The countryside around the institution (state school is largely a misnomer) is rolling and beautiful. The trees and grass provide contrast with the red brick structures.

The buildings themselves, about the size of large two-story country schoolhouses, are divided into huge sleeping rooms, day rooms, a kitchen area, dining room, and toilet facilities.

From the outside, the buildings look like portions of pretty college campus. Inside the resemblance is to army barracks used for basic training.

Privacy was not a consideration in construction, as it was not in building barracks. Only the ease of supervision was considered. At Belchertown a small number of people supervise a large number.

Beds crest like waves in a rolling sea. They are placed end to end, row after row. Clothing and the permitted few personal possessions go in a separate common room. The wrinkled garments are stuffed in uniform rows of cubicles.

Toilet facilities are modeled after army latrines. Rows of commodes without protective seats are lined against one wall, a shower, used by as many as 50 persons, is at the end of the room. The drain is in the bathroom floor and there is no shower curtain.

The scene outside is of natural beauty--unmelted snow covers the rolling hills and highlights the red brick of the buildings.

Inside, the normal senses rebel. They recognize no beauty, only the horrors of a human warehouse perpetuated by the state.

A visitor next walks inside the double-locked doors of Building K, the terrible "backwards," into the stench created by 48 years of neglect, urine and human wastes.

Smell and sight are overpowered by the stink. But if that's bad the sight of men--other human beings--but retarded, standing around naked or holding their pants up because the laundry ruined the fastener, is worse. Physically grown men roll on a cold tile floor, sit in grotesque positions motionless, or rock rhythmically back and forth. Others are bent into strange poses on stark prison-made benches.

The youngest is 15. The oldest is 80 plus.

Most will probably die in Building K, one of many buildings on which no state official wants his name affixed. There is nothing to commemorate here.

Other Belchertown warehouses don't smell as bad. But the same prison-like starkness pervades every building housing adults--even a modern structure a few years old.

Buildings housing children are more colorful. But most parents would think twice about allowing their children to live there. Most have no choice, however. It's the children of Belchertown who suffer the most. They could be saved the horrors if proper help were available in the community.

Belchertown and the five institutions like it serve as hideaways for people who don't fit into a modern technical society because of retardation.

"The only difference between Belchertown and Auschwitz is the lack of gas chambers," commented Dr. M. Phillip Wakstein, former regional director of mental retardation for the Department of Mental Health. To complete the parallel, Wakstein pointed to a rail siding coming into the institution's warehouse. (Wakstein was fired for revealing conditions at Belchertown.)

Many state legislators visit the institution each year.

Some are shocked.

Many say they are shocked. Most leave the grounds--many without having seen the worst of the institution-- then apparently forget every detail of their visit, particularly when voting on appropriations.

Dr. Gunnar Dybwad, a consultant to the President's Committee on Mental Retardation and one of the world's experts, was aghast at Belchertown's conditions, especially the dehumanization.

"There is one basic principle which should be followed in dealing with the retarded, or the mentally ill, or the handicapped. That is normalization," he said.

"The retarded person should live in as normal a condition as circumstances will allow. He should not live in an institution which is totally alien to everyday living, which strips his very humanity from him," Dybwad said.

Belchertown was built for less than 1000 people. At present it is about one-third over capacity, housing about 1100 residents. In 1967 there were 1650 residents.

Belchertown suffers another plague besides dehumanization, a sterile environment which encourages insanity as an escape from stark reality. It is handcuffed by severe staff shortages. It has stagnated because its administrations have been locked in by civil service or political patronage. Poor salaries fail to maintain or attract the best staffs. Those who do remain are woefully underpaid.

Portions of the Presidential report on retardation sound as if all of the research was done at Belchertown.

"...residents in state institutions for the mentally retarded live in disgraceful conditions that the states' own regulatory agencies would not tolerate in privately owned facilities for anyone," the report says.

"The bad old days" in retardation is the large warehouse giving custodial care to the forgotten retarded," it continues.

"That picture, tragically and disgracefully, is still true about many of the nation's institutions for the retarded."

Belchertown's greatest tragedy is that it need not be that way.

The question each person must ask is if he can permit such an existence to continue for another person, or if he will--through his own inaction and unconcern--allow the state to turn people into caged animals.

Tomorrow. A closer look at the realities of Belchertown.

(James M. Shanks, the author of the series, has earned himself a position in the world of "advocacy journalism" for not only his work in producing the series, but also for the work he has done since the printing of the series in bringing the conditions at Belchertown to the public eye.)

Money Problems

Although summer school was cut down several years ago, cutting it any farther could be detrimental to many members of the UMass community. This eight to ten week period of studying in under some of New England's finer weather has almost become a regular third semester here. It has given undergraduate students the chance to get through this University in only three years instead of the traditional four. It has allowed students to make up credit lost during the fall and spring semesters. Surely, we do not want to see it cut to the point of only serving swingshift freshmen, nor would we want to see swingshifters cut out of summer sessions.

Graduate students might not be able to stay because their fellowships depend upon a certain number of credits being reached by next January, that number of credits determined by the students' ability to attend a summer session.

Thomas B. Campion, Vice Chancellor for Administrative Affairs, explained to the Collegian late last week that if revenue from the use of dormitories during the summer disappears, and outlays stay about the same, then room rents may have to increase next fall to make up the difference.

Administration sources have stated that summer school cutbacks are only one of several ways in which they are trying to reduce expenses because of the proposed tight budget. We hope that they come up with a better method. We hope that students will use their voting power to influence legislators not to cut any more from the slim UMass budget.

The Play In Peking

There was a play on television Sunday night.

It was covered live by the three networks. Everyone had known about it for weeks, indeed months before. The whole was waiting for it, and yet no one has realized that it's started. "Arrival in Peking", Act I, Scene 1. It has come and passed.

If you watched Nixon's arrival in China Sunday night, you may have been entranced with what you saw. China. What do we know about China? Visions ranging from the true egalitarian state to Orwell's 1984 run through one's mind with even a mention of the world. But let's pause for a moment and look at a brief hour at the meeting between the symbols of East and West. The United States and China.

Air Force One taxied to a stop, the whine faded, and the stairs moved into position. The door opened, and for a moment, ((five, ten seconds?) you caught a glimpse of a camera man inside the plane at the doorway, filming the Nixons' approach to the exit. Then, yes. The Nixons. They took a left, and walked out onto the platform leading from the plane, breathing Chinese air, under a Chinese sky.

Four lines awaited them. Two were the Foreign ministry and Peking officials, the other two were long lines of soldiers, the "Red Army" as they are called. One person was at the bottom to meet them, Premier Chou-En-lai.

They descended slowly. Broad, barnstorming, political smiles crossed their faces, and faded at the lack of music or cheering crowds. But they recovered. (Dick isn't the President for nothing.) Pat Nixon waved hesistantly, and stopped. No one was waving back. The Chinese started to clap, and Nixon followed, till he too was subdued. They knew something wasn't right. It wasn't the usual political welcome.

Can you imagine? The leaders of two of the most powerful nations on Earth, sworn enemies for 20 years, finally meeting. It could change the history of the world. Grasp it and turn its flesh to what those minor characters wanted. It was the return of medieval diplomacy. The kings meet, talk, and decide the fate of millions. Or something out of a science fiction book. Two alien cultures (for that's what we are) meet. One the exuberant western. Nixon with his back slapping and broad smile and firm handshake. The American politician. And Premier Chou-En-lai, now what is he...

A good six inches shorter than the President. Smaller, slimmer, a solemn face. He knew the importance of what he saw, what history he was making. This wasn't an election campaign, no, this was a decision over worlds. A withered right arm, a reminder of the revolution. The contrast was immense. Two totally different cultures.

At first the Premier led the way to the troops, but then fell back a pace or two, and let Nixon lead. A test? Down the line of troops, Nixon still smiling, he is the politician.

Then into the cars and a drive off into empty streets. For a long moment, no one, nothing. There was a shot that sticks in my mind. The motorcade driving down a narrow empty street, a street that stretched for miles it seemed, leading to an empty horizon. A high stone wall along one side that the camera was shooting off of, and a park with a stone railing on the other. Trees bare in the Peking winter, no people, not one, anywhere. Where are we indeed?

But the play ends, as it must. We, the audience go back to our homes, out to a day's work, satiated for a moment, waiting for the next thrill, the next glimpse Are they still playing, but now for real?

Or is all we get the image of an American president reviewing a line of Chinese troops stretching down to an empty horizon, with a small Premier, his arm withered from the Revolution? Walking silently behind.

War In A Nutshell

"As American troop strength is reduced, the number of air strikes being flown by United States planes has increased to as many as 250 a day in South Vietnam. U.S. planes also fly scores of missions in neighboring Laos and Cambodia."

-Feb. 16 N.Y. Times

That's the war in a nut shell, according to the Times. News reports preceding and succeeding that statement supports its grim validity.

Times, Feb. 12-"American Air Force and Navy jets flew 100 missions in South Vietnam during the 24 hour period ending at dawn today, the largest number in six months."

Times, Feb. 14-"The U.S. flew the highest number of B-52 bombing missions in a single 24 hour period, between noon Feb. 12 and noon Feb. 13, since records began to be kept...There were also 162 strikes by Air Force and Navy fighter bombers."

Times, Feb. 15-"The bombing campaign is also reportedly being carried on with equal intensity across the border in Laos and Cambodia, but the United States command does not disclose the details of its bombing there beyond acknowledging that American planes including B-52s fly missions in Laos and Cambodia daily."

On the 15th the Times also noted that the U.S. had broken the record again for B-52 bombing missions in a single day. In the same time period, 176 Air Force and Navy fighter bombers flew strikes.

On Feb. 16, the war was not mentioned in the Times until page 8.

Times, Feb. 16-Speaking of the six days from Feb. 10-15; "The bombing campaign, which directed almost 1000 fighter-bomber strikes and 75 B52 missions (most missions involve more than one plane)... was equally intensive just across the border in Laos."

"The U.S. command refused to confirm or deny that B-52 bombers recently ordered to Guam from the United States were flying missions over South Vietnam. It said only that air operations 'could' include B-52s from Guam.

"It was reported elsewhere, however, that B-52s began flying missions from Guam yesterday."

A spokesman from the U.S. 7th fleet "acknowledged an increase in (air craft) carriers and support ships."

Times, Feb. 17-The bombing campaign now under way in South Vietnam, described as the heaviest in 18 months, entered its second week with no let up in sight."

Writing from Saigon, Craig R. Whitney reported in the Feb. 17 Times: "There are indications that the United States command is preparing to revise its predictions of when a countrywide enemy offensive might begin and to keep up its intensified bombing, for months if necessary."

Quoting 'a senior United States military source'; "We've got to do something to protect the pilots if we're going to have them flying missions."

When the Southeast Asian people learned at a horrible price in arms, legs, eyes, and lives, to defend themselves against "pineapples", Honeywell Corp. of the U.S. developed the "guava". Neither one of these weapons is any good against buildings or gun implacements, but they tear the hell out of human flesh. The U.S. developed electronic sensors that detect sound, body heat, and even the ammonia in body odor. These sensors direct bombing attacks, day or night, to the "enemy area". A slide show depicting these and other forms of the air war and electronic battlefield will be shown at a Teach-in sponsored by the Student Mobe. Speakers at the Teach-in will include Mike Best of the Econ. dept., Dick Minear of the Hist. dept., and Jules Chametsky of the Eng. dept.

Topics to be discussed will include the economic and political reasons for the war's continuation, and ways to end it. The Teach-in is scheduled for Wednesday, Feb. 23, from noon to 3:00 PM in room 163 (Senate Chambers) of the Campus Center. The more we know about it, the better we can fight it.

Letters To The Editor

Apples & Oranges=Baloney

To the Editor:

When attempting to respond to Mr. Moriarty's editorial commentary, "Dockworkers, Miners Strike," it is difficult to choose a starting point from which to begin to dispel the series of false analyses, based on incomplete and selective information, perpetrated there. Although there are innumerable examples of such misconceptions, this writer will address himself to the most blatant--Moriarty's apparent effort to create an analogous situation between strikes in Great Britain and the U.S., with absolutely no recognition of the inherent differences in industrial relations systems in these two countries. Any students of comparative labor movements realizes that drawing sych a comparison is like attempting to add apples and oranges; the results are always contrived, and, of necessity, spurious.

The key issue that Moriarty ignores is the varying role of the government in the industrial relations systems of the nations in question. Although the historical credo of both labor movements is "Voluntarism" (i.e. self-reliance), this phenomenon evolved in totally divergent directions in Britain and the U.S.--the former, developing a strict interpretation, the latter favoring a looser one. In Great Britain, there are no co-called labor laws, leading to a situation where there is no institutionally acceptable means for the government to intervene in a labor dispute. In contrast, the State in the U.S. provides the unions with their raison d'etre, that is, the American labor movement receives most of its power and security from a series of Federal Acts dating back to at least the Thirties. Therefore, an explicit dependence on, and acceptance of the role of government exists in this country (if only unwillingly), while it does not in Britain.

As a serious student of the labor movement, and one who hopefully plans on devoting a career to making union leadership more responsive to the needs of the rank and file, it is extremely difficult for me to defend an individual with such a checkered and questionable background as Harry Bridges. However, a defense is necessary.

In the wake of a Taft-Hartley injunction, Bridges and the entire nation were no doubt aware that the Nixon administration was "chomping at the bit" to take punitive action against the West Coast Longshoremen. With the threat of new anti-union legislation hanging over the entire labor movement as a result of his union's actions, Bridges opted for a more cautious route in conducting the strike. In 1934, he had chosen the other alternative as the Longshoremen's leader, and on a day known as "Bloody Thursday" two of his people were killed and hundreds injured as they resisted a police attempt to break the strike.

It is difficult to equate the winning of a jurisdictional dispute over which union (the Teamsters or the I.L.W.U.) should have the right to handle a shipping container upon its touchdown on a dock, with the chance of the loss of human life or crushing punitive legislation. Mr. Bridges, a man with unionists' blood on his hands, put in a position of bringing a "plague" down upon all of the country's union members, made the only realistic choice, in light of the government's position and his personal experiences. The leader of Great Britain's miners is faced with a similar dilemma, but rather than the government, he must singlehandedly contend with the welfare of his nation. In the context of the U.S.'s industrial relations system, his actions show gross irresponsibility. But, he is not in the United States, and cannot be judged by the criteria that Moriarty uses to judge Harry Bridges.

Just The Facts

To the Editor:

"Truth is confirmed by inspection and delay; falsehood by haste and uncertainty," (Tactus-Annales 11, 38), a quote brought to mind after reading that the Graduate Student Senate was petitioned to oppose the renaming of the Department of Environmental Sciences to the Department of Agricultural and Environmental Microbiology, (MDC, February 16, 1972). I am very disappointed and saddened that these "concerned" students, members of an academic community where quest for truth should be paramount, did not make the slightest effort to ascertain the reasons and merits of such a name change. Not one member of the Department of Environmental Sciences was ever contacted by any "concerned" student. In the interest of truth and fairness, we should have been given an opportunity (and these students should have demanded) to enter into a dialogue prior to taking such a one-sided and unfair resolution to the floor of the Graduate Student Senate.

Prior to taking any further action, I urge and respectfully request members of the Graduate Student Senate to get all the facts relating to the proposed Departmental name change. They have only to cross the street and will find my office open

Finally, I have always stressed in my classes that truth can be determined only after the collection of precise data and the unbiased analysis of such data. Was this procedure followed by the students who presented the resolution.

Attention

To the Editor:

Responding to the "Amherst Election Page" in last Friday's Collegian.

Attention Voter Registration Committee re your article, "Fighting the No-Vote Theory." It's too late to lay a guilt trip on these new non-voters. These people are too hip to run out and register when you call them "slough-offs." When you talk snide: "Have you ever entertained the thought of the power possible bla, bla." (Non-voters don't even dig a power trip by true liberals!) When you command authoritarianly, "Do something though! Don't just sit in the Hatch."

Attention Sue Roy, Special Assistant to the President of the Student Senate for Voter bla, bla, bla: Thank you for proving so graphically that the new non-voters have no meaningful choice to make among the candidate for Selectman Bob-Garvey- Frank-Decker-Leo-Bouchard- Steve-Keedy. Your Women's League of Voters type of inciteful questions reveal that these men all have the same basic qualifications, i.e., an establishment- oriented concerned citizen. These men also see Amherst's urgent problem as the same, in sum: how to dispose of the extra excrement from this town's population explosion so the townees can grow richer and fatter without raising a stink.

Attention Dick Howland, Student Senate Attorney: re your essentially unreadable article on "Voting Mechanics": Nevermind attacking the new non-voters, you concentrate your shit on the newly registered students, E.G., "I wonder how many will actually vote at all, much less vote intelligently." And, "...those who have gone to the trouble to register now and don't vote are in fact condemning their fellows bla, bla." Honorable Advocate for Students Esquire, laying this holier-than-thou shit on young people went out with the Civil Rights Movement in the early '60's.

Where is it at? Students will register to vote only if and when two conditions meet in time: (1) there is a public issue that gets to their own gut and (2) voting offers them a meaningful prospect for constructive change. (Maybe "Community-control of Police" is one of those issues, maybe it is not.)

It's Incredible

To the Editor:

I know a lot of students complain about the Dining Commons food and people are probably tired of hearing about it. However I feel I must once again bring up this matter. Today while eating a brownie in Franklin Dining Commons I discovered a worm in it. Granted it was very small and even looked dead but still; a worm?

Granted the Food Services have a tremendous task in cooking for so many people. I think it would be too much to expect the food to taste as good as home cooking and I don't. However I do think the food should be sanitary (i.e. no more worms). Students pay a good deal of money to eat here and I think that we deserve food which is at least edible. It is time that the Food Services stopped supporting the motto; "If it's edible, it's incredible."

By BURNELL WILLIAMS

Self entertainment can create self enjoyment. Winter Carnival was the occasion that was the main attraction for most UMass last weekend. The activities, which included musical, cultural, and generally entertaining events were quite appealing. But to whom? Perhaps to those who could afford it or to those who could enjoy it. Thus some students found it necessary to create their own special occasion in all social circles on campus. At the New Africa House, folks found what they were looking for: two nights of dynamite entertainment with a congenial atmosphere that seemed to make it a funky affair. It was something that people really got into because it was something that could be related to. Even though the University made an earnest effort to satisfy its community overall, students still felt it was necessary to do their own thing. This move towards responsibility in self-entertainment is necessary to balance the weight of the social needs and academic pressures. No matter who you are, or what you are, you own gig is usually the best. Part of the problem for students is involving themselves in the solutions to their needs. In our case, brothers and sisters, let's support the New Africa House and the activities that happen there, for this may well be our only outlet towards social satisfaction.

It's For Practice

To the Editor:

Today, the town elections will be held, and some eight to nine humdred of us here in Mud City will be presented with an opportunity to vote. Our page in last Friday's Collegian was an attempt of sorts to suggest reasons why it is important for this particular group to go to the polls and take advantage of that opportunity.

I am relieved, that in my officious-sounding post of Special- Assistant-to- the- President- for- Voter- Registration, I've been spared the job of endorsing, defaming or ignoring any of the candidates.....I'm supposed to be impartial. Had I been required to assess each candidate; I would have felt that same left-handed, backward silliness that hit in '64 in high school when the literary magazine went comprehensive on Goldwater and Johnson. Why? Simple: the campaign process projected a sense of vague importance to our lives, but somehow, on a concrete level, it was tough to figure out exactly why. Yes, it's true, we've been hard pressed to make this election relevant to student voters. Discussing the pro's and con's of any candidate in this election would have to ultimately include the fact that all of them are town-oriented, although their flexibility on the subject of students does vary considerably.

Why then, go and vote? Well, much of the town's power rests in the hands of the town meeting members, who are also (a third of them in each precinct) up for election. During the annual town meeting they are precisely the people who set out the directions for the town to take in the ensuing year. Rumor has it that in precinct 2 (Southwest) there is one more space than candidates for meeting member, a good place for a write-in of some registered student.....

So this year it's for practice. Next year, we want more students registered, and since precincts 2 and 3 are predominately student residence areas, tell me why the town meeting members in those precincts should be from the town. This is your power; for a beginning. It's not that difficult to be informed about town doings; your average town meeting members as a working person has as little free time to be informed. This is known as "doin' your homework". There's no reason why an informed and registered voting constituency of students cannot in future years; like next year, take on an amount of power in the town proportionate to their actual numbers. This is known as "taking care of business". Group: it really can be our ball game, and we can possibly play it as it lays. The point is that the time is ripe to get ourselves together on this particular issue.

What Will You Be Doing In 1980?

By PHILIP SCHIRMER

The number of graduates of America's colleges and universities increases significantly between 1968 and the present. There is no reason to believe that this trend will change appreciably in the future. Does this mean that the supply in the "skilled workers" department will exceed the demand in the job market for the coming decade?

According to the U.S. Department of Labor, the answer to this question is both yes and no.

The over-all prospect holds for a general balance of supply and demand in the next 8 years with an estimated 10.5 million in the manpower force filling a projected 10.4 million vacancies, (6.1 million to take care of occupational growth and 4.3 million to replace other workers). Unfortunately, this "over-all" balance is achieved at the expense of imbalance with respect to individual occupations.

Specifically, professional health occupations, (dentists, physicians, dietitians, etc.), should continue to experience a shortage of personnel along with those hiring chemists, physicistsm and counselors. The supply of engineers, geologists, (and geophysicists), and optometrists should fall slightly short of requirements while architects and lawyers willl fill their vacancies fairly evenly. Pharmacists will find the competition a little tougher and those with intentions of becoming mathematicians, life scientists or teachers will find the supply significantly above the demand.

The changing manpower situation in the teaching fields especially, should be given careful attention by those considering this field, (women primarily since they constitute 70% of the teachers in the U.S.). Where shortages of teachers were reported in 20 of the 49 states participating in a survey by the National Education Association in the summer of 1966, by 1969, only two states reported deficiencies. Present enrollment figures in this field in the nation's universities promise a continuation of this upward trend.

As for the scientific fields, the shortage of chemists, geologists, and geophysicists may be remedied somewhat by transfers from the life science and mathematics fields where surpluses are expected.

Other areas which will probably experience shortages in worker supply are those connected with or related to the planning and administration of local governments. These would include urban planning and social work.

So thus the enigma lies: an adequate number of positions but an uneven distribution of talent and training. Perhaps it's not too late to reconsider.

Wallace To Run In Maryland

ANNAPOLIS, Md. (AP)-Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace said Monday he intends to run in Maryland's Democratic presidential primary May 16 and expects to win.

At the same time, Wallace said the Democrats "might make me mad" at their national convention in Miami Beach and propel him again into a third-party bid for the White House.

Maryland Gov. Marvin Mandel said it is too early to forecast how any candidate will do in his state's primary, which will award 53 national delegates.

Mandel said Wallace has a Maryland constitutency but he doesn't know how big. Wallace rose to power in Alabama as an ardent segregationist. Maryland is a border state.

Wallace said he will challenge the party's presidential aspirants in at least 10 primaries.

The Democrats met on the eve of the National Governors Conference opening Tuesday in Washington.

Wallace denied at a news conference that he has made a deal with the Republican administration or anyone else to forego third-party presidential candidacy in 1972.

"Let's cross a lot of bridges when we come to them," Wallace said. "I might get to Miami Beach and they throw me through the rooftop. That might make me mad, that might hurt my feelings. There's nothing worse than a politician scorned."

Wallace said that with 10 to 12 candidates likely to be on the Maryland ballot "we expect to win this primary."

Wallace's first primary test this year will be in Florida March 14, and he said, "every poll that they run in Florida, I'm leading."

Wallace said he also plans to enter the May 16 Michigan primary. He said party leaders there are saying he will get 25 per cent of the vote. Wallace said that would be enough to run first in a crowded Democratic field.

The Alabama governor said he also expects to be on the ballot in Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Indiana, North Carolina, Tennessee, Rhode Island and New Mexico.

"Jewish Life" At Smith

The series of program entitled "Want in the Midst of Plenty: a Critique of American Jewish Life" continues at Smith College Tuesday (Feb. 22) with Bill Novak, who will speak at 7:30 p.m. in the Browsing Room of the Neilson Library.

Mr. Novak will discuss the recent trends and new directions initiated by the young in a talk entitled "Philip Roth and Our Situation: Growing up Jewish in America." The series, sponsored by the B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundations at Smith and Amherst Colleges, is open to the public.

The editor of "Response", the national magazine of new Jewish thought and culture, Mr. Novak is a member of the Chavurat Shalom Community Fellowship of Peace, a religious commune in Boston. His articles have appeared in numerous religious publications.

Chess Meet Tuesday

The UMass Chess Club Championship tournament will begin Tuesday, February 22, at 7:00 P.M. in the New Hatch. Entry fee is $2.00; club membership is not required. Play will be in two sections, one rated by the U.S. Chess Federation, one unrated (USCF membership not required). Trophies and USCF memberships as prizes.

In last Tuesday's simultaneous exhibition, USCF Master Dr. Stephen Jones played nineteen opponents, defeating sixteen. Bob Corwin and Barry Cohen drew him, and he was upset by Mike Stankiewicz.

Miners Get 20% Pay Increase

LONDON (AP)-The government has warned British labor unions who are seeking higher wages not to expect big increases like those won by the mineworkers.

As the nation's 280,000 miners prepared to vote on acceptance of the pay package offered them after a six-week strike that crippled the country in a power crisis, Employment Minister Robert Carr served notice Monday that the government was determined to hold the line against further inflationary wage hikes.

The miners extracted pay increases averaging 20 per cent in a deal that blasted a gaping hole in the government's unofficial wage hike ceiling of 8 per cent.

Claims now are pending from railroad unions, nurses, teachers and London transport and building workers. Their leaders are expected to use the "special case" argument which was the lynch-pin of the miner's victory.

Although the miners have lifted their picket blockade on power stations and around stockpiled coal, they are not due to vote on the offer in national ballot before Wednesday and a resuption of work is not expected before next Monday.

Power blackouts, which have reduced industry to three-day week and cut electricity supplies to millions of homes on a rotating basis still were fierce. Trade and Industry Minister John Davies forecast in the House of Commons the cuts would continue at the same level for some time and that it would take a month for the situation to return to normal.

The National Coal Board Monday commandeered every available truck, train and ship to rush stockpiled coal to fuel-starved power stations. Up to 80,000 tons was shifted over the weekend, after miners' leaders accepted the recommended pay boost early Saturday.

Women workers pack candles as they come off conveyor belt at Price's Candle Works in Wandsworth, London, Wednesday. The London blackout, caused by a coal strike, has activated a boom in candle-making, with this particular firm alone producing a half-million candles a day. (AP)

JV Skaters Edge Deerfield

By ROY LYONS

Yc i've heard of Dennis and Bobby hull and Phil and Tony Esposito, but have you heard of Jay and Kevin Connors? Deerfield Academy has, and they're not likely to forget them for awhile. The Arlington natives had a hand in all four goals as the skaters edged Deerfield, 4-3 in a game played last Thursday night at Deerfield.

As the score indicated, it was a closely contested struggle with neither team able to mount a sustained offense. Although unable to contain Deerfield's high scoring line which featured Kevin Carr centering for Joe Anderson and Tim Hausmann, John Binkoski completely stymied the rest of the prep school squad in the UMass nets.

The Redmen opened the scoring at 2:12 of the first period when center Jim Murphy rammed home a rebound after a scramble in front of Deerfield goalie Grady Lake. It was a power play goal with Carr off for elbowing.

Hausmann evened the score at 3:28 with a deft tip-in of a Carr slap shot from the right point. Binkoski never had a chance.

The tempo picked up in the second period. Anderson registered a power play goal for Deerfield at 1:11 with Brian Mulcahy off for tripping. The penalty was carried over from the first period. Binkoski seemed to be partially screened on the low drive.

Jay Connors scored the first of his two goals at the 5:50 mark with Murphy getting an assist. It was the final power play goal of the night. Doug Taylor was serving a two minute minor for slashing.

Carr sent the home team ahead at 10:48 with a backhander from a tough angle that broke off Binkoski's stick.

Mike Ellis and Kevin Connors combined at 13:10 to knot the score again. Ellis set it up with a brilliant rush. He simply overpowered the Deefield defense on the rink long dash before leaving the puck for Connors. Kevin snapped a quick wrist shot over Lake's left shoulder.

The third period saw both teams playing defensive hockey with a total of only eight shots being fired on net. The only goal came at the three minute mark and proved to be the clincher. Kevin Connors fed a perfect pass to his brother Jay who jammed it past Lake. The Redman defense combined with Binkoski to thwart the Deerfield attack the rest of the way.

Coach Russ Kidd's post-game attitude was highly ambivalent. In view of Deerfield's noted tenacity on their home ice, he seemed pleased to come out on top. However, he did appear to be dismayed with the squad's continued inconsistency.

Pats Name PR Director

New England Patriots general manager Upton Bell has announced the appointment of veteran Boston newspaperman Pat Horne as the club's Director of Public Relations.

Horne recently retired from the Hearst newspaper in Boston, the Record American - Sunday Advertiser, after more than 25 years service that started as an office boy and culminated as the paper's pro football writer for the past eight years.

A native of County Cork, Ireland, Pat had experience in every phase of the newspaper's editorial operation and won a number of awards for his coverage of the sports scene. Before moving to the pro football beat, he served for 15 years as schoolboy sports editor and college writer for the Record American. He has covered every major sporting event in Boston from World Series to Stanley Cup playoffs, from NBA championships to tennis tournaments.

Educated in the parochial schools of Boston, Pat is a decorated veteran of four years service with the Army Air Corps during World War II and spent 26 months in the China-Burma-India theater of combat operations.

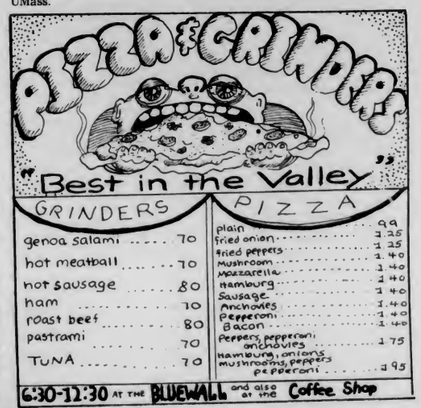
One of the founders of the New England chapter of the Pro Football Writers Association of America, Horne has been the New England representative on the Pro Football Hall of Fame board of selectors.

In expressing the Patriots view of Horne's addition to the front office staff, general manager Upton Bell declared, "We are very fortunate to secure a person of Pat's caliber, talents, and background to join our organization and head the important public relations department."

Pat resides in Weymouth with his wife (Arlene) and three daughters.

Frosh Hoopsters Take 13th Straight

By MDC STAFF



The mighty mights of the UMass freshman basketball team-Mike Flanagan, Bill Endicott and Jim Burke-came to the forefront Saturday when the big Redmen couldn't contain the big guys from Rhode Island and rescued a 98-80 win to keep their unblemished record alive at 13-0.

UMass center John Murphy had his problems with Rhody center Bill Bird (6'10) and picked up four quick fouls in the first six minutes....this set the stage for the heroics of "mighty mights incorporated."

Against the towering Rams-6'10, 6'7, 6'1 up front-this scrappy trio outshot, outran, and rebounded with the taller guys from Kingston. Between the three of them they raised more havoc for the Ram frosh than the weather did on what had to be an unpleasant ride home for them.

After an early deficit the little Redmen came running back to grab a six point lead at half time. However in the early moments of the second half Rhody dominated and took back the lead. But frustration lead to frustration for them as mighty might incorporated went to work and dealt the Rams out of the game.

Just to rub in the aggravation a little more, Murphy entered early in the half and outlasted Bird who fouled out after a series of three quickies from the ref.. His knees were bruised from fouling the little guys from UMass.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

by SYDNEY OMARR

Capricorn is capable of getting into "hot water." However, natives of this zodiacal sign can also extricate themselves. They seldom are completely helpless. A Capricorn can be wary and canny. These persons can stalk and can pounce and climb and eradicate the negative in order to create the positive. Some famous persons born under Capricorn include Henry Miller, Edwin Newman and Loretta Young.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Ideas now can be translated into gain, profit. Key is to be bright with future and wise with past. You will comprehend. Be selective. Avoid one who constantly complains. Stress versatility, humor.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Synthesize information. Get complete story. Put puzzle pieces together. Finish project. Refuse to be doormat for one who is aggressive, inconsiderate. Financial dealings are highlighted.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Lunar cycle coincides with new opportunities, greater self-expression. Personal magnetism soars. Opposite sex is drawn to you. Stress original approach in all areas. Trust your own judgment.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): One behind the scenes may be making plans which involve you. Strive to keep informed. Activity indicated in connection with hospital, institutions, charitable organization. Adhere to Golden Rule.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Stimulating period. You receive compliments. Sense of humor is active and appreciated. Some special desires are fulfilled. Social activity abounds. Go places-see and be seen. Come out of emotional rut.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Iron out details connected with goals, ambitions. One in authority is keeping close watch. Carelessness now is costly. Know this and respond accordingly. You could be honored by professional associate.

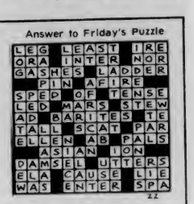
LIBRA (Sept. 23—Oct. 22): You are going places. This may be literally or otherwise. Means you grow, mature and may actually embark on journey. What concerns you is potential, philosophical concept, principle. You'll achieve.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Review investment procedures. Money situation spotlighted. Get backing from family member. You will need moral support. It is available. Taurus and Libra individuals figure prominently. Be diplomatic.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Lie low. Play waiting game. Observe and refine; get rid of that which is superfluous. Trim away wasteful procedures. Emphasis is on marriage, partnership. Joint efforts are most apt to succeed.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Improve relations with co-workers, associates. Those who perform special services should be praised-and paid. You gain now by acknowledging debt of gratitude. Act accordingly. Another Capricorn is involved.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Creative effort enables you to successfully conclude assignment. You gain added recognition. Member of opposite sex plays important role. You can be happy-if you give yourself a chance. Message will be clear.



PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): You get to heart of matters. Basic issues now can be resolved. What was a dilemma is eradicated. Aquarian is in picture. Hunch pays off; you are right place at right time. Follow through on advantage.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you were on your own at relatively early age. This is true in sense that you were at least psychologically separated from parental authority. You now are going through a period of self- discovery. If single, news of marriage is upcoming, with plans being made in October and the "event" occurring in 1973.

Seven Redmen Score In Rout Over Colby

By TOM PLANT

The UMass Redmen hockey team went up against a young aggregation from Colby College on Friday night, and for the second time this season they mauled the Mules, this time by a score of 7-1. The Redmen defeated Colby by a 6-1 margin at the Williams Invitational Tournament back in December.

The Mules' roster was filled mostly with freshmen and sophomores, and their relative inexperience in comparison with the more polished Redmen juniors and seniors eventually made the difference in the contest. The Mules could not muster any real pressure in the entire game.

Both teams started slowly, resulting in a rather unexciting first period. The Redmen got on the scoreboard first at 6:59 when Dan Reidy, after taking a feed-in pass from Captain Brian Sullivan at the point, shoveled a backhander past Colby goalie, Scott Ryerse. A minute and ten seconds later, the Redmen made it 2-0, as the shot by Bob Bartholomew from the point trickled into the net after bouncing off the skates of Charlie Donovan. Neither team could do much offensively after that, until with only seven seconds remaining in the period, Colby's Dan Heaney took a shot from the left face-off circle, that was stopped by P.J. Flaherty, but Peter Boone was perfectly positioned to flip the rebound by the off-balance goaltender.

The Redmen definitely began to dominate the action about halfway through the second period. At 10:50 of the period Jack Edwards enlarged the lead to 3-1, as the Redmen put great pressure on Ryerse. After making three or four good saves through a crowd around his net, Ryerse was finally caught out of position as Edwards slammed in a rebound from ten feet out. And Colby still had not applied any pressure on the Redmen defense. At 15:25, and a power- play in effect, UMass scored its fourth goal on a pretty play begun by Al Nickerson. Nickerson carried the puck out of his defensive zone, hit Eric Scrafield with a pass at the blue line, and Scrafield in turn passed perfectly to Chico Shea, who was alone about twenty feet in front of the net. Shea fired it through Ryerse's pads to make the score 4-1. Mike Waldron made it 5-1 before the period ended, with assists going to Donovan and Don Lowe. Flaherty had to make only four saves in the second period, as all that Colby could do was dump the puck into the Redmen zone and chase it down, and they did this unsuccessfully.

The third period was simply a continuation of Redmen dominance of the action. At 6:23, the Redmen scored again with a Colby player in the penalty box. Chico Shea led the puck unchallenged for five or six seconds to the right of the Colby goal, setting up the power-play. Finally, Eric Scrafield made a quick move and tipped Shea's perfect pass by the Colby goaltender. Freshman Frank Evans was now in the goal in place of Ryerse, as the Redmen continue to find the range on the Colby net. On another UMass power-play, some good hustle by a Colby forward almost caught Flaherty off-guard, as P.J. had skated halfway to the blue line when the player stole the puck, but his shot was wide of the open net. At 17:23 Don Riley finished off the scoring a nifty play from behind the Colby net. Riley, with the puck behind the play from behind the Colby net. Riley, with the puck behind the net, faked in one direction, which brought goalie Evans to his knees, and Riley then skated around the other side to flip in the backhander, making the final score 7-1. Evans made twenty saves in the third period, to only six by Flaherty.

Bowdoin Rolls, 8-4

By ALAN WRIGHT

The UMass varsity hockey team was purely outclassed on the ice during its last game of a four-game homestand Saturday afternoon. Bowdoin College (who has let everyone know that they won't be defending their Division II crown in the playoffs) brought busloads of fans from their Maine school to see the Polar Bears blitz the Redmen 8-4 and retain a "sentimental" #1 standing.

Maybe it was because the game was being televised live over WBBC Channel 57, or maybe Bowdoin was just psyched up to show UMass who is the better hockey power, but the boys from up North really played their best game all year. The game was extremely physical, and for almost two full periods, it was a well- played tilt at Orr Rink. But then Bowdoin tucked UMass in their back pockets and controlled the rest of the game by scoring seven straight goals.

The first two scores of the game were UMass ones and they occurred nearly simultaneously at 2:09 and 2:52. The intial marker was scored by Jack Edwards on assists from Dan Reidy and Pat Keenan while the latter tally was attributed to sophomore Jim Coleman on an assist from Charlie Donovan.

Bowdoin connected at 9:51 to close out scoring for the first period. UMass came out pressuring in the second stanza and Coleman scored his second goal of the afternoon at 10:30. At this point, Bowdoin College began perfecting on their precision passes, and sparked by the verbally partisan crowd, started to control and scored at 18:35 and 19:35 to tie it up 3-3.

In the third period, Bowdoin came right back relentlessly to fire goal #4 at 1:09. The UMass line of Waldron, Donovan, Lowe, Sullivan and Keenan were working hard, but Bowdoin started picking them apart by scoring their fifth and sixth goals at 6:15 and 6:36 respectively.

It soon became evident that Bowdoin College's hockey team was just plain better conditioned than UMass and they really showed their overpowering ability in that final period.

Another Bowdoin score came at 11:59 and it looked like it was all over for the Redmen. Lonnie Avery saved face for UMass a little by hitting on a slapshot at 17:49 on an assist from Jim Lynch and Al Nickerson.

Bowdoin added insult to injury by scoring a final goal at 19:34 to make it 8-4. When the Polar Bears had left with their multitudes of vivacious fans, pep-band and hockey hoopla, it was difficult not to ponder the fact that Bowdoin College played better at our Orr Rink on Saturday afternoon than they had played all year. After all, this same Bowdoin club was beaten earlier in the season by Merrimack 5-4 in overtime. The Redmen had soundly beaten that same Merrimack club a few nights later 8-3. But then, who knows what will happen in the hockey battles of intercollegiate athletics.

Gymnasts Gain Crucial Victory Over Navy

By JANE CROOK

The UMass Varsity Gymnasts closed their home season here Saturday with a decisive, though Navy.

The meet, originally scheduled for 2 p.m., was postponed for four hours because of the heavy snow, but despite the delay, the team played "psyched", and the meet went on at 6 p.m. with only two judges officiating. The win was a BIG one for UMass, giving the team added incentive for crushing Temple next week. Obviously, the home floor gave the Redmen an edge, but most important it proved UMass could score 155-plus, and now holds a 6-2 slate to carry to Temple.

Saturday's meet was a little too close for comfort. Although UMass won five out of six events, the difference between scores was always less than one point. Once again UMass showed it had the needed depth, placing at least two men in each event, excluding side horse.

Leading the Redmen in the meet was senior co-captain Tony Vacca, whose fantastic all-around performance netted him a 51.10 total and top honors. Vacca had consistently strong routines on all six events, placing on four of them, and taking first on the parallel bars. Seemingly recovered from a serious injury and illness bout, Vacca's scores proved crucial for the UMass victory, with everyone of his event scores counting toward the team total. Coming through on each single event, Vacca had one of his most satisfying all-around nights since his shoulders gave on him in early February.

Other strong performances for Massachusetts included John Calabria and Jack Berner on floor, Jay Aronstein and John Oliver on rings, Jay Thompsen and Steve Scuderi in vaulting, Dave Genest on parallel-bars, and Tom Mysliicki and Scuderi on high-bar.

Event for event, floor exercise got UMass off to a great start, as it out-tumbled Navy 26.35-25.60. Calabria captured the event with a strong 9.05. After coming back from an ankle injury early in the season, it appears "Zip" has finally stabilized his exciting routine in the 9-plus bracket. In previous meets his performances have always been so close, only to have one shaky segment keep his score in the 8's. Jack Berner followed with a nice 8.8 exercise good for second place. Hess of Navy took third with an 8.7.

All one can say about sidehorse is that the fans thought it would be Navy's event, and it was. As was expected, the dynamite sidehorse due of Swanson and Worthington easily walked away with first and second places. Swanson's amazingly clean, trick-packed, 9.55 routine awed the fans as well as the UMass gymnasts. Worthington's 9.15 left little doubt that the Midshipment would carry the event.

Vacca's best sidehorse effort this season was pretty exciting for the Redmen. His 8.45 gave him third place, and proved to be a vital score for UMass in an event where they couldn't afford to lose much ground. The rest of the Redmen sidehorse effort had disappointing and unexpected breaks, giving Navy a 1.75 lead going into the rings.

UMass won still rings, but not by enough to regain the lead. Jay Aronstein led the Redmen again, taking first in the event, but a shaky straight arm shoot kept his score at 8.75. John Oliver also scored lower than usual, touching out, and receiving an 8.4. Benesh of Navy also tied for second with an 8.5.

Then came vaulting, and the beginning of a strong comeback that would see UMass sweep the last three events. UMass cleaned up on the longhorse, placing first, second, and third. Jay Thompsen, per usual, paced the Redmen, executing one of his highest vaults, scored at 9.25. Scuderi's 8.8 gave him second, and Vacca followed closely with an 8.75.

Parallel bars were next, and UMass led by .1 of a point, an edge too slim to relax over when just one serious break on either of the last two events would jeopardize its win.

UMass again proved it had the depth, sweeping all three places, and picking up an additional .85 of Tony Vacca won the event with an 8.7, followed by senior co-captain Dave Genest and Scuderi who tied for second with 8.65's.

Finally the fans could breathe a little easier going into high-bar, one of the Redmen's strongest events, with a .95 of a point lead.

Senior Tom Mysliicki opened the scoring for the Redmen with a strong 8.8 routine. Then Steve Scuderi, second to last man up for UMass, psyched Navy out with his outrageous 9.2 effort. Scud's incredible trick-laden, tremendously executed routine, highlighted by amazing dislocates, practically wrapped it up for the Redmen who still had another man coming. Navy's Jacobson just grabbed second with an 8.95.

Last man up for the event, and for UMass was Vacca. Coming through with his fifth high-8 score of the day, Vacca hit for an 8.9 without his double-twisting flyaway to solidify the UMass victory.

This was an extremely important win for the Redmen. A loss here would have killed its chances for a second place finish in the East. But now more doors are open. On paper UMass, Temple, Navy, and Springfield are all within a point of each other, meaning any team can win on any given day. A win at Temple could make second a reality!

STEVE SCUDERI, shown here on the pommel horse, was a key figure in the UMass victory over Navy.

Runners Capture Third YanCon

Special To The Collegian

After months of practice in Curry Hicks Cage, the UMass Track team took advantage of the spacious Maine Fieldhouse to break five school records on their way to capturing their third consecutive Yankee Conference Championship. Heavy pre-meet favorite Connecticut was left in the starting blocks as the Redmen scored early and often to avenge the 31 point loss they had suffered at the hands of the Huskies in Storrs just two weeks earlier.

Upset momentum started in the early events of the program. The Redmen sprinters and hurdlers advanced through the qualifying trials with ease. Senior Co-Capt. James Graves coasted to a 60 yard high hurdle victory in 7.6 seconds after earlier qualifying in 7.5, one tenth of a second from the field house record established by Engla ,ls Olympic Gold Medal winner, Dave Hemery.

Two veteran sprinters took the line against the 1971 champion Dan Weed from Rhode Island. For 60 yards the three men ran as one and it was Senior Ron Harris upsetting the Ram's defending champion with a great lean at the tape as junior Redman Tony Pendleton was edged for second by the same margin. All three runners were timed in 6.3 seconds which are lifetime bests.

The turning point of the meet came in the one mile run. UMass junior Rick Barry and freshmen Randy Thomas were ranked fifth and seventh milers in the conference before the meet. After a conservative start, Barry and Thomas moved with the leaders and with a quarter of a mile to go, favorite Alan Shorey of New Hampshire had a six yard lead over the closing Barry and Thomas.

Urged on by their team mates who had encircled the track, Thomas burst past Shorey with a 60 yard sprint to the finish in a new field house record of 4:12.9. Shorey dove at the tape to nip a fast closing Rick Barry and both were timed in 4:13.2. Thomas's time broke the UMass freshmen record held by eventual New England Champion Ron Wayne by eight seconds and was his lifetime best by that margin. Barry's 4:13.2 represented an improvement of five seconds over his personal record.

UConn's hope to pull even was in the middle distance events. Holy Cross ace Rick Comeau won a torrid 600 race in 1:11.2. UMass junior Steve Levine came from the unseeded heat to place third and Sophomore Steve Crimmin placed fifth. Both runners were timed in 1:12.3 for a new varsity 600 record and all 5 runners were under the old Yankee Conference mark held by Olympian Jeff Bannister.

UConn's Jim Verdon won the 1000 yard run for 6 points but these were quickly offset by the "M Boys" from UMass. Senior Co-Capt. Al Manga, Arnie Morse and Soph. John Maloney finished second, third and fifth places respectively for eight more team points. Freshmen Devon Croft ran 2:15.9 good enough for a new freshmen record, and his lifetime best by five seconds, however not enough for the top five in this star studded field.

The Huskies retaliated with one-two in the High Jump for ten points. UMass freshmen Mark Hughes shared fifth place with 6'2 and senior Ed Shaughnessy, last years runner up was forced to withdraw due to an injury in the long jump.

Any ideas of making a run at the Redmen's commanding lead was dispelled in the two mile run. Three UMass distance aces Mike McCusker, Doug O'Connell and Bill Gillin shadowed pre-meet favorite Rick Crook of Holy Cross for a mile and one half. With two laps to go O'Connell and McCusker roared away from the rest of the field to finish one - two, and in the last 200 yards freshmen Bill Gillin sprinted from fifth place to third place. Only three seconds separated the three UMass runners who were engulfed by a screaming mob of team mates almost before they crossed the finish line.

Freshmen Thomas had the fastest split on the two mile relay to add to his earlier record and Graves, and Levine ran the quick legs on the mile relay. With the relays kicking in 5 points, it was frosting on the cake. Sophomore Steve Bradley and freshmen Peter Ryan kept their poise while many a long jumper lost theirs. Their fourth and fifth places were good for three points. Junior Barney Schneider had his best day in the shot, placing sixth, only six inches from third place

The finals score was UMass with 57 points, UConn with 49, with some outstanding individual performance, Maine edge Rhode Island 31-1/2-31. Holy Cross, Vermont and New Hampshire followed with 19, 10 and 9 points respectively.

In what Coach Ken O'Brien called a "super effort - we couldn't have done better" the UMass team left the crowd buzzing with remarks like "the most spirit I've seen in any team in a long time" and "an outstanding performance that will do a lot for track in Maine". They also left most opposing athletes talking to themselves and wondering how a team that lost 12 of the top 16 men last year could come so far - so fast.

As Coach Ken O'Brien summed it up "We have 20 rookies who have never seen a conference championship on this years team. However we have 10 veterans, who pass on a great tradition, and have taught these rookies what to expect - and how to win."

Redmen Six Upset

By BILL BALLOU

Manchester, N.H.—After the two hockey teams, had skated off the ice, about 30 guys brandishing brooms took their places. The two hockey teams were St. Anselm's and UMass, and the 30 guys with the brooms had come to play a game known as broom hockey.

The net in broom hockey measures five square feet more than the net in ice hockey, and the UMass Redmen could have used the five extra feet, as they hit the post and missed numerous opportunities on their way to a 5-4 loss.

St. Anselm's, a team composed solely of freshmen and sophomores, delighted a small crowd at Kennedy Coliseum in Manchester, N.H. by registering a major upset win over the Redmen. The Saints were led by Jim "Mercury" Morris who assisted on four of the five St. Anselm's goals, and literally skated rings around the lethargic UMass defenders.

Chief sniper for the Saints was Mike Murphy who fired home the first goal of the game and the eventual game-winner. The victim of the St. Anselm's assault was sophomore goalie Chick Rheault, starting his first varsity game of the season in place of P.J. Flaherty.

Rheault played brilliantly the first two periods, but had a troublesome third period when he let two Saint goals slip him him. However, it was a creditable performance for the soph, as he stopped 20 of 25 St. Anselm's shots.

The game was played under less than ideal conditions; for example, when UMass arrived in its "dressing room", the team discovered that the "dressing room" consisted of little more than three toilets and a closet, forcing some of the team to dress on the bus and the rest to dress in shifts. And after the second period, senior center Dennis Grabowski came down with severe stomach cramps, but a doctor couldn't be found, and he had to suffer. It was that kind of night.

St. Anselm's did anything but suffer, as the Saints parlayed great goaltending by little Andy McNulty and a two-man advantage into a 1-0 first period lead on a goal by Mike Murphy at 3:33.

The Redmen then came storming back with two goals in the second period to take a 2-1 lead. Jackie Edwards scored with a two-man advantage at 3:06 and Charlie Donovan followed up shortly thereafter with the second UMass goal.

Steve Daigle hit for the Saints at 10:25 to send the game into the final period deadlocked at 2-2.

At 3:19 things looked bright for UMass when Al Nickerson made a brilliant solo dash to feed sophomore Jim Coleman for the go-ahead goal. However, St. Anselm's came back just 37 seconds later.

That seemed to break the Redmen's collective back, and the Saints scored two goals within the space of 51 seconds about halfway through the period to take a two goal lead. Jim Gavin and Mike Murphy were the culprits, both goals being set up beautifully by Morris.

Dan Reidy's goal at 12:07 served to spark the Redmen, but try as they might they could not beat McNulty for the typing tally.

The loss makes this a truly disastrous weekend for the Redmen. A good showing could have gone a long way to cinching the top seed in Division II playoffs. However, the third period blues against both Bowdoin and St. Anselm's has put UMass in the position where they must, as Eric Scrafield said, "get it together." They can't afford to waste any time.

Hoopsters Roll Over Rhody

By FRANK ANOSIEWICZ

Last Saturday afternoon, a blizzard hit Amherst and when the flurry had cleared, Rhode Island coach Tom Carmody sat in disbelief of the final score-a 109-64 humiliation for the Rams. URI, a team which had beaten Providence only a few days earlier and a pre-season favorite for the Yankee Conference title, was literally hustled right off the court in the first six minutes, as the starting five of Charlie Peters, Tom McLaughlin, Al Skinner, Peter Trow, and Mike Pagliara, amassed a 21-4 lead.

A small, wet, but vocal partisan crowd trudged to the Cage to see the Redmen play their finest game of the year. Metawampee's warriers so overwhelmed the beleaguered Rams with their pressing, hustling, and stealing game, that Rhody forgot how to perform its wizardry and were constantly running into each other and throwing the ball away. RI committed 12 turnovers as opposed to just five for UMass in the first half. Within the first fifteen minutes, two of the big Rams, Steve Rowell and Don Blackman, were in serious foul trouble with four each. The halftime score, 59-29, was similar to that of last year's NIT massacre by North Carolina over the cagers. RI hit only 9-26 fieldgoals and 11-22 free throws, as opposed to 22-40 and 15-18 for the Redmen in the first half.

For all practical purposes, the game was over at halftime. A bank of lights over the home stands dimming, a canister of Coke fizzling and the RI cheerleaders arriving were the high spots of the second half, as the dejected Rams resorted to the tactic of taking their frustrations out on the opposition, instead of setting up an offense. Though Rowell, Blackman and Robert Young fouled out of the game early, there was no doubt that they could not stop the Redman express.

Coach Jack Leaman after the game, sat back and breathed a sigh of relief, very pleased with the way his cagers had rebounded from three consecutive losses to once again regain a one game lead in the Yankee Conference. Leaman said, "Rhode Island was not ready to play. They were in the clouds after beating Providence and hearing of our losses, they were not ready." In reference to his own team, Coach Leaman said, "Peters, Skinner, and Mac did a fantastic job on the boards early in the game." He went on to say, "We had balanced rebounding and the team rebounding as a team was what we needed to get to win." Coach Leaman also had praise for the execution which was near perfect which caused as Leaman said "RI to lose their cool."

Balanced rebounding and scoring really was the story, as six Redmen had between six and eight rebounds each, and six hit double figures in scoring. The leading scorer was McLaughlin with 22, followed by John Betancourt with 20. The Redmen hit a sizzling 46.8% from the floor and 81.4% from the charity stripe, as opposed to 38.1% and 53.3% for the Rams. UMass is now 13-8, while RI falls to 10-10.

Oh man that's no road! It takes some pretty stiff winds to make drifts like that. If I were you I'd head the other way. Double back maybe. No, I don't think you should. Go plow right through and don't ever look back. It's the only way. (Photo by Barbara Brecher)

S.O.S. Plans Belchertown Support

By CHARLEY BERKOW

It was billed as the second organizational meeting for the newly formed Students Offering Services, but the meeting in the Campus Center last night turned into more of a rally, building motivation in the students who came.

SOS is a student group trying to find ways of helping the class action filed recently by 28 parents of patients at Belchertown State School for the mentally retarded. Joe Sylvia, chairman of SOS, said that the suit amounts to the assertion of human rights for the retarded.

He described SOS as "A collaboration effort of students, faculty, and the community to help children."

SOS is supporting the suit in two ways.

One way is money. SOS is kicking off a fund-raising drive tomorrow on the concourse level of the Campus Center. A table will be set up on the concourse level of the Campus Center where slides will be shown of the state hospital from 9 in the morning till 4:30 in the afternoon. Funds and volunteer workers will be solicited.

Also, in the near future, a raffle will be held.

The other support will come in the form of getting endorsements of the suit from students, faculty, and community leaders. Student Senate President Lee Sandwen, MDC Editor-in-Chief Jim Gold, State Representative John Oliver of Amherst, among others, have all endorsed SOS.

"The support is there," Sylvia said. "All we have to do is gather it."

There are three task forces at work gathering support. One is working on students, another on faculty, and the third on the outside community. The task forces will all be recruiting members at the SOS table tomorrow and on Friday.

Recently SOS sent letters to 40 editors of college newspapers in Massachusetts. They were asked to support the organization. Mike Aguda, Editor-in-Chief of the Greenfield Community College Forum is forming another SOS at that school.

SOS is trying to publicize the suit. Said Sylvia, "The more people know about it, the more support we will gather."

Articles about the suit have recently appeared in the Boston Globe, the Springfield Union, the Hampshire Daily Gazette, and the Amherst Record, in addition to the MDC. The suit is also getting coverage in the electronic media, including WMUA.

In his pep talk, Sylvia said, "The parents have done something that has never been done before," when they challenged the inhumane conditions at Belchertown State School. "Investigations have been saying for 100 years that the mental institutions in this state are inhumane..."

Sylvia pointed out that since a legislative commission found the conditions at Belchertown to be intolerable, another legislative commission had found conditions at the Monson State Hospital to be just as bad.

He said that suits to grant rights to similar patients are underway in three other states, but none have gotten as far or been as successful as the Belchertown case, which has passed through the State courts.

Sylvia also said, "If students ever wanted to get involved, if students ever really wanted to make a change, this is their chance."

He said that the Belchertown case could have nationwide implications. "I don't see this thing as small peanuts...It can become a big thing...It has to."

Volunteer Army Unit In Training

FORT DIX, N.J.-The 187 men in B Company, First Battalion, Second Brigade, now in the seventh week of their basic training here, are making history of a sort.

The unit, to the Pentagon's knowledge, is the only basic-training group in the Army consisting entirely of Regular Army volunteers-men who have enlisted for two or three years.

B-1-2 gives the Army the unique opportunity to study the possibility of the all-volunteer Army that President Nixon has said he wants by July, 1973.

Even after B-1-2 disbands as a training unit next week and the men go their separate ways to different units and specialized training schools, the service performances and the reenlistment possibilities of the men will be under scrutiny, according to spokesmen here.

The Army wants to find out if these young men will reenlist at the end of their first hitches. Many have said they enlisted only for the technical training that will serve them outside of the Army, and others have said they enlisted because they had low lottery numbers that made then vulnerable for drafting.

Will men continue to enlist without the threat of the draft? Are recent pay increases, liberalized benefits and looser disciplines making the Army so attractive that an all-volunteer force will become a viable concept? The Army would like to know.

At the Fort Dix Training Center, which greets entrants with two signs proclaiming the 30,000-man post as a volunteer Army center and an equal-opportunity employer, the Army says that B Company, First Battalion, Second Brigade "just happened; we didn't decide to create an all-R.A. group."

It suggests that the unit "happened" as a result of months of low Selective Service calls that cut drastically the numbers of draftees inducted into active duty.

The units' company commander is a 26-year-old Pennsylvanian, Capt. Howard K. Fisher, a graduate landscape architect from Pennsylvania State University and a Vietnam war veteran. Of its 187 men, 63 come from New York, 35 from Connecticut, 32 from New Jersey and 37 from Pennsylvania. Most of the remainder come from other northeastern states.

B-1-2, also called Bravo Company, has 128 high school graduates, seven men with college degrees and 30 with at least one year of college. The rest have attended high school for two years or more. The average education level of Bravo Company is 11.3 years of schooling.

Women's Economy Role Discussed

By JEANNETTE MARTINEAU

Carol Jusenius, Assistant Professor of Math, Statistics, and Economics at Smith College, and Peggy Howard, Assistant Professor of Urban Economics at Hampshire College, spoke at last night's colloquium on "Women in the Economy" on Orchard Hill.

"Education for women is considered consumption," Prof. Jusenius began, "for men it's considered an investment in human capital...so that he is able to earn more money."

"38% of women finish their education on the high school level, as opposed to 31% of the men. Only 7% of the women finish at the college level, while 12% of the men finish here."

"The fact that a college degree is not viewed as essential for women is evident in the drop-out rates. Men don't finish because of financial reasons, or lack of interest. Women quit to get married."

Professor Jusenius explained that "college education for women is more specialized...in fields that are considered socially acceptable for women...like education, English, and psychology."

"47% of the women are in the labor force," she continued, "and 60% of these women are supporting a family."

She further explained that women make a "double entry into the labor force...60% of 18-25 year old women work, before they get married and have children...and 60% of the women 40-55 years old, who have children in high school or college."

"Women are secondary income earners," she continued, "White women don't bother to collect unemployment insurance when they get laid off...they tend to just drop out of the labor market altogether."

"This will come as no surprise to you, but it does to some economists," Peggy Howard began, "there are men's jobs and there are women's jobs...men's jobs, like truck drivers...and women's jobs, like secretaries. Men are hired as supervisors, and women as operatives...the split is rationalized. There may not be any major job differences, but the segregation is arbitrary."

"There are more women white-collar workers than men white-collar workers, she said, "but the women white-collar workers are not business executives but secretaries and clerical workers."

Among the more popular excuses for this, Professor Howard said that employers felt that women were "less steady workers, irresponsible, they quit to have kids, they don't take their jobs seriously."

"Statistics show, however," she continued, "that when they have been standardized for jobs, women don't quit...and that the turnover rates for men and women civil service employees is about the same. The absentee rates...including child-bearing...is one half day per year more for women..hardly significant."

"During the War, men went into the service, and women took over men's jobs in factories. War took precedence over gentlemen's agreements. When the War ended, men couldn't stand for unemployment. This drove women back into the homes," she continued, "where they had babies with a vengeance, in the late 40's and early 50's."

"There has been a long-term increase in women's labor participation since 1947.. with the kinds of jobs increasing."

Professor Jusenius then commented that "in our culture working in the home is not valued. Many functions performed in the home, if done by specialists would require college-educated people...nurse, teacher, chef. If housewives were to demand $10 per hour...how many men would switch jobs. It all depends on your system of economy...what determines values...and we live in a capitalistic system."

Meeting For NPAC

Jerry Gordon, national coordinator of NPAC, will be speaking at the SMC Indochina teach-in held today in room 163 of the Campus Center from noon to 3:00 p.m. Mr. Gordon, who has visited North Vietnam, gave up a law practice in Cleveland to work full time in the antiwar movement. He will also be a keynote speaker, along with Noam Chomsky of MIT, Arthur Galston of Yale, and Fred Branfman of Project Air War, at the SMC Conference in New York this weekend. All are urged to attend.

Commuter Elections Declared Null And Void

The Student Senate Executive Committee last night declared null and void last week's Senate Commuter elections. Senate President Lee Sandwen stated the reason for this action resulted from "flagrant and deliberate violations of election rules by some candidates through campaigning in front of election booths." Because of this ruling, the 11 victors for the Commuter seats will have to run again with the losers in new elections scheduled for March 2.

Dodge Appointed To Conservation Group

By CHARLEY BERKOW

Dr. Wendell Dodge was appointed to the Amherst Conservation Commission in yesterday's Board of Selectmen's meeting. This meeting was the last one attended by H. Hills Skillings as a Selectman.

The Selectmen seemed in a hurry to end the meeting, as they refused to resolve a conflict between the School Building Committee and a farmer who wants to keep his cows in a barn on the building site. Instead, they adjourned into a reception in honor of Skillings, who is retiring after twelve years as a Selectman.

Earlier, Dodge was nominated for the Conservation Commission position by Town Manager Allen Torrey, who said, "We feel that he will give us a good professional tie with the University, federal agencies and wildlife."

Dodge replaces Dr. William Sheldon, who has been on the Conservation Commission since its inception in 1962. Dodge will also replace Sheldon as the head of the Massachusetts Cooperative Wildlife Research Unit, in the College of Agriculture here at UMass.

As requested by Selectman Nancy Eddy, Torrey agreed to have a letter written to a contractor building apartments off East Hadley Road, concerning excess litter from the construction site.

Torrey also said that he will study a proposal by Ms. Eddy for a mobile glass and paper recycling center for residents unable to make it out to the recycling center at the town dump.

The Selectmen also dealt with minor licensing and budget problems.

Professor Talks On Vietnam

Tom J. Farer, Professor of Law at Rutgers University Law School will discuss "U.S. War Crimes in Vietnam: Is there a case for prosecution of military and civilian leaders?" Thursday, February 24 at 8:00 p.m. in Sidney D. Gamble Auditorium at Mount Holyoke College.

Mr. Farer was formerly Associate Professor of Law at Columbia University Law School. He has written a great many articles concerning civil strife, guerrilla warfare and the applicability of humanitarian laws of war.

The lecture is the first of a series on Criminal Justice sponsored by the Mount Holyoke College Lecture Committee.

Rhetoric Requirement Debated

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

Whether or not to continue the University's rhetoric requirement and what substitutes are viable was discussed last night at the weekly meeting of the Student Senate Committee on Academic Affairs.

Subjects included defining the reasons for a rhetoric requirement, possible substitutions for the requirement, the effectiveness of the program as it now stands and ways to gather the opinions of students now taking required rhetoric courses.

Walker Gibson, the head of the Rhetoric Department express the program's basic job as being, "Not work in the area of teaching grammar, but teaching the student how to express himself." That is he, explained, teaching the student how to let others know what he is thinking in a clear manner.

Joe Frank, head of the English Department said Rhetoric 100, the basic rhetoric course, was one of "the hardest courses to teach. You are not transmitting information, but theory, telling people how they can communicate."

Mark Solin, a student on the Committee said the theories were fine, but the teachers tried to do too much, "ending up with nothing. The teachers will go off on different tangents, facing a vast difference in the students they are teaching. The students, with the exception of a few, are uninvolved, disinterested and have no idea what was going on."

Gibson admitted that there were problems in the courses, one of them being the large number of sections (97). He said they were trying to improve but needed more information. "Unless we know our hands are tied."

Specifically he said the training for the graduate student TA's was being improved, and despite the program's faults, it was good.

It was pointed out that the complaint most heard from professors in all departments was that their students did not know how to write well.

Malcolm Sillars from the Speech Department suggested a writing lab where professors could send students who they felt were in need of help. The writing lab concept, he said, would be for students from all departments and could possibly take the place of required rhetoric courses. He went on to say that this approach had been tried at other colleges, and had met with varying degrees of success. At one he said, "the sciences kept on sending their students who they felt needed help, while the social sciences soon stopped, assuming that the kids just couldn't write."

Gibson said the rhetoric department was under "some pressure from the Dean's Council to back away from the approach we use now and go back to teaching pure grammar. Some kind of remedial course. We'd like a little support to keep the program free-swinging and open, with options that have some intellectual advantage."

Gibson expressed his desire to "share ambitions and problems. The courses are wide open. We are ready to expand the number of new options and increase the number of options in existing courses. We already have a number of fairly inventive structures."

Both Gibson and Frank denied they were fighting the removal of the rhetoric department from fear of loosing jobs or having the budget cut. They stated that jobs would be available for those professors who now teach rhetoric if the requirement was abolished.

Student Senator Gary Gomes brought up the gap existing in the CCEBS rhetoric program. Having taken a CCEBS rhetoric course himself, Gomes felt that it failed to reach the black students in the class. While it helped the white students, Gomes said the course had a nullifying effect on black students. "They were not being helped...they were running into a system that was trying to imprison them in a way of writing-a way white society wrote, something that isn't relative to themselves."

Sillars saw the problem as being not just a matter of language. "If you take people from one subculture and put them into another (the University) how do you give them a meaningful education?"

Parts of the discussion concerned whether or not to have requirements at all.

Nick Apostola, Chairman, suggested that perhaps what the students needed was not required courses but better counseling.

Sillars took issue with him saying that "students don't take advice. It's there if they want it," he said, "but they don't take it." Alec Vashin, a student said the advice given was of low quality that they didn't know what was offered at the University. A swift reply came from Frank. "The English Department has 16 advisors, who are all underworked." He said the advisors were picked by both students and faculty. He felt it was one of the best counseling programs on campus.

While there was some sentiment against a questionnaire, most of those presented seemed to agree that it would be of value in determining where the program succeeded and failed. It was suggested instead that all the rhetoric classes be assigned to write an essay evaluating their classes, the specifics being decided beforehand. The Council asked if the paper could be assigned and due before semester break, to facilitate evaluation. There was some debate as to whether or not this was feasible. No definite decision was reached, but at the close of the meeting it seemed likely it would be done.

Others in attendance were Jerry Allen, Dean of Arts and Sciences, Seymour Shapiro, a previous Dean of Arts and Sciences, and Micheline Dufnu, Chairman of the French Department.

Peace Corp Featuring Budget Cuts

The full-time voluntary programs in this country--Peace Corps and VISTA--are threatened with budget cuts that would have the effect of dismantling the programs.

Last year it was VISTA. This year Peace Corps was faced with a cut that would have forced a return of about half of the 8,000 volunteers now overseas and the total elimination of programs in a dozen or more countries.

Travis Gamble, a former Peace Corps volunteer, who will be on the University of Massachusetts campus in Amherst on February 28 through March 2, talked about the effects these proposed budget cuts have on morale, inside the agency and with applicants.

"We were probably less paranoid than we've been in past budget crunch experiences," the representative said, citing several things that helped to keep the people he works with from feeling that they were on a sinking ship.

"First, we kept getting reassurances throughout that Congress has always gotten it together and given both Peace Corps and VISTA the monies they need."

The representative claims that more important to their combined psyche was the reaction from the public and especially from people who were thinking about applying.

"In our dog years (late 60's) when applications were way down and nobody seemed to care much, I guess the news would have turned people away.

"This year, throughout the news of the possibility of a Peace Corps budget cut, people kept on applying. I think the common attitude was 'I want to do it and I'm not going to be put off' ", he said. Gamble noted that a renewed interest in both Peace Corps and VISTA began to surface over a year ago.

Nixon Trip Bridging China-American Gap

PEKING (AP) — President Nixon and Premier Chou En-lai apparently have plunged into the heart of discussions to span the gulf left by 22 years of hostility.

Nixon said before he arrived that he expected his meetings with Chou would last two hours, but Tuesday's session went on for almost four. Only their close advisers were present.

The Chinese left little doubt they attach great importance to Nixon's mission. On Monday, he met unexpectedly with the usually remote Mao Tse-tung. Then the Chinese press broke its silence on Nixon's visit and splashed the story with pictures of Nixon with Mao and Chou.

And Tuesday evening, Chiang Ching, wife of Mao, with Chou and his wife, took the Nixons to a ballet with a revolutionary theme. Chiang Ching, firebrand of the cultural re-volution in the late 1960s, sat at Nixon's left. On his right was Chou, who has expressed hope that the presidential visit could lead to normalization of relations between their nations.

On Monday, Nixon and Chou held a largely ceremonial meeting in the Great Hall of the People. Tuesday, the meeting room was small. Chou and Nixon faced each other across a rectangular table only a few feet wide.

Nixon was accompanied only by a translator and Henry A. Kissinger, presidential adviser on national security. Secretary of State William P. Rogers held a separate conference with China's foregin minister, Chi Pen-fei.

Chou and Nixon were jovial and friendly. They laughed while posing for photographers. Then the doors closed behind them.

No statement came out of the meeting except the expected announcement that Nixon and Chou are continuing their discussions Wednesday.

The ballet was held in the third-floor auditorium of the Great Hall of the People.

There unfolded a three-hour ballet in the manner of Chiang Ching-"The Red Detachment of Women." Mao's wife had promoted and sponsored the modern ballet. It featured the struggle of a poor peasant girl who finds salvation in the People's Liberation Army from the tyranny of a landlord.

The ballet in six acts ran for nearly three hours before about 2,000 spectators. Then the Nixons bade farewell to their hosts and left for the government guest house assigned to them.

Mrs. Nixon began her sight-seeing with a visit to the kitchens of the famous Peking Hotel. She complimented the chefs and tasted a few dishes.

Later she toured the Summer Palace 12 miles west of Peking, admiring the lacquered throne room of the Dowager Empress and the jade flowers.

Mrs. Nixon also paid an unexpected visit to the Peking Zoo, and while looking at the pandas disclosed that Chou is giving a pair of the rare animals to the United States. Nixon is giving the Chinese a pair of musk ox, largely unknown in China.

In Brief...

House-Senate Committee Agrees to $3.2 Billion Appropriation

WASHINGTON (AP) — House-Senate conferees agreed Tuesday to a $3.2-billion appropriation for foreign aid and related agencies.

Sen. William Proxmire, D-Wis., called the figure a real disappointment, but Rep. Otto Passman, D-La., described it as fine.

The bill would appropriate $2.6 billion for military and economic assistance itself, and $72 million for the Peace Corps, a split between the Senate's $77.2 million and the House's $68 million.

It would restore $86 million to the United Nations' own foreign-aid program for which the House had cut all 1972 money.

South Vietnamese Harassed in Central Highlands

SAIGON (AP) — Enemy troops harassed South Vietnamese forces in the central highlands Tuesday. In the Northern provinces, Saigon forces claimed some gains against Communist-led infiltrators.

Most of the attacks in the central highlands were minor and aimed at rural villages and hamlets, which are protected by militia men and People's Self-Defense Force units.

These forces, often poorly trained and equipped, are an easier target than regular South Vietnamese troops.

Young Kennedy Among Passengers Freed by Arab Hijackers

ADEN (AP) — Arab hijackers freed all passengers aboard a commandeered German jumbo jet Tuesday, including the eldest son of the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

"It was just too much," Joseph P. Kennedy III said of the ordeal as, tired and ruffled, he tottered into the airport lounge with 119 other male passengers.

Women and children and one elderly man were released hours before and Lufthansa airlines said most left by plane for Beirut.

Some of the women said at least one passenger had been pistol whipped and that the hijackers wired the doors with explosives before the plane landed.

Witness Says Gilday Fired Gun at Bank

BOSTON (AP) — A Brookline man testified in the murder trail of William Gilday, Jr., Tuesday that he saw Gilday firing a gun at the front door of a bank the day patrolman Walter A. Schroeder was shot to death there.

Discrimination Ban Bolstered

WASHINGTON (AP) — After nearly five weeks of debate, the Senate overwhelmingly passed a compromise bill Tuesday to strengthen a federal law banning racial and other discrimination in employment.

The legislation would provide new powers to enforce the law and bring additional millions of employees, including those of state and local governments, under its protection.

Passage came within three hours after the Senate voted 73 to 21, or 10 more than the required two-thirds majority, to put its filibuster-breaking cloture rule into effect.

Two earlier attempts to cut off the debate, prior to adoption of a compromise on the key issue of enforcement powers, had fallen short of the necessary two-thirds margin.

The bill would strengthen the enforcement powers of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, created by a 1964 law banning job discrimination based on race, religion, sex, or national origin.

It also would bring state and local employees and employees of educational institutions under the law for the first time and extend coverage to employers and labor unions with as few as 15 employees or members, instead of 25 at present.

A bill passed by the House does not extend coverage.

Sen. James B. Allen, D-Ala., and Sen. Sam. J. Ervin Jr., D-N.C., led the fight against the bill, which had been before the Senate since Jan. 19. Members had been closely divided on it until an amendment was adopted last week striking out authority for the EEOC to issue cease-and-desist orders.

That amendment, sponsored by Sen. Peter H. Dominick, R-Colo., provided instead that the EEOC would have to bring suits in the federal courts to enforce its findings of job discrimination.

The EEOC now is limited to trying to effect voluntary compliance with the law, although the Justice Department may bring suits when it finds a pattern or practice of discrimination by employers or labor unions.

Even after the third cloture moved succeeded Tuesday, an unexpected parliamentary maneuver by Allen and Ervin had threatened to ensnarl the legislation in further delays.

Their move would have enabled a filibuster to go on unless cloture was invoked a second time.

IRA Avenges "Bloody Sunday"

ALDERSHOT, England (AP)-Seven persons including five women and a chaplain died at Britain's biggest army base Tuesday in a bombing aimed at avenging Londonderry's "Bloody Sunday."

The Chaplain killed was a Roman Catholic who had been decorated for risking his life working for peace in Northern Ireland.

Nineteen persons, including 12 officers, were injured in the attack on the headquarters of Britain's elite 16th Parachute Brigade at Aldershot, "the home of the British army."

In Dublin the Leftist official wing of the Irish Republican Army said the blow was to avenge the deaths of 13 Londonderry civilians in a Jan. 30 clash with paratroopers from this brigade. It claimed a triumph for its "successful retaliatory operation" but regretted the civilian casualties. One male civilian was killed in addition to the five women.

A stunned House of Commons heard Home Secretary Reginaul Maudling condemn "this outrage" and vow a massive search for the bombers.

Police surrounded the base 40 miles southwest of London.

The priest blown to pieces with the other dead was Capt. Gerry Weston, 38. He recently received the MBE-Member of the British Empire.

The 1st Paratroop Battalion of the 16th Brigade was involved in the clash with Londonderry rioters. It is still in Ulster. The army rejects charges that the paratroopers fired indiscriminately at unarmed civilians.

Repeating the stance, the army told a British court of inquiry in Ulster that the troops fired only at suspected guerrillas and only after snipers fired at them first.

The inquiry in Coleraine, about 25 miles from Londonderry, is being conducted by Lord Chief Justice Widgery, Britain's top judge. Tuesday it went into what happened on "Bloody Sunday."

Elsewhere in Northern Ireland, troops clashed with rioting mourners at the Belfast funeral of a 14-year-old IRA junior guerrilla, victim of an apparent training mishap.

Troops beat rioters with truncheons and fired rubber bullets to drive back the surging crowd.

The trouble began when the soldiers tried to arrest about 40 uniformed junior IRA men after shots were fired over the boy's body in a traditional IRA salute to its dead.

Howard Hughes Wins High Court Hearing

WASHINGTON (AP)-Howard R. Hughes, the secretive billionaire, Tuesday won a Supreme Court hearing in his bid to wipe out a record default judgment against his Hughes Tool Co.

The $165-million judgment, more than 30 times greater than any other judgment in an American court and gathering $900,000 in interest each month, was awarded Trans World Airlines in 1968.

The appeal to the court was Hughes's last hope in the case since two federal courts in New York City had approved the judgment, recommended by Herbert Brownell, a former U.S. attorney general who served as a special master. He concluded Hughes Tool violated antitrust law because of its failure to purchase jet aircraft for TWA in the 1950s.

The award resulted from a default judgment against Hughes Tool in 1963 when he refused to appear as a witness and produce certain evidence.

The case will be heard by the justices next winter. At the time of the alleged violations Hughes Tool owned more than 78 per cent of TWA stock.

Returning from a four-week recess, the court granted a hearing also to attorneys for Sen. Mike Gravel, the Alaska Democrat who is trying to scuttle a grand jury investigation into arrangements for publication of the Pentagon Papers. At the same time, however, the court announced it would hear an appeal by the government, which is trying to broaden the inquiry.

At the moment, under a ruling by the U.S. Circuit Court in Boston, the grand jury there may not question Gravel or his assistants about the arrangements but may ask his aides about their own conduct before they went to work for him.

Gravel, a critic of the Vietnam war, disclosed portions of the war study last June at a midnight meeting of a Senate subcommittee. He later arranged for publication of a four-volume edition by Beacon Press, the publishing arm of the Unitarian Universalist Association.

At issue before the court is the meaning of the constitutional provision that members of Congress "shall not be questioned in any other place" for "any speech or debate."

On another front, the court took on a case from San Francisco in which a group of white tenants brought suit against their landlord charging that he was keeping Negroes out of the apartment complex.

The tenants, backed by the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare as well as the Justice Department, are relying on federal civil rights laws of 1866 and 1968 which prohibit racial discrimination in the sale and rental of housing. The question for the court is whether the tenants have the legal right to sue. The apartments are owned by Parkmerced Corp.

Pat Gets China Perspective

PEKING (AP)-After two days of sampling Chinese culture and cuisine, Pat Nixon is geting an inside look at how the Chinese masses live and work.

She pays a visit Wednesday morning to the giant Evergreen People's commune in Peking's northwestern suburbs, where 40,000 persons live in 9,000 households.

In the afternoon she tours a Peking glass factory employing 530 workers.

She'll rejoin President Nixon for an evening gymnastic persentation at Peking Capital Field.

On Tuesday, the First Lady made a tasting tour of the kitchens of the famed Peking Hotel, visited the elaborate Summer Palace on a frozen lake outside the capital and watched a revolutionary ballet in the Great Hall of the People.

She also paid a surprise call on the Peking Zoo and announced that Premier Chou En-lai is giving a pair of pandas to the United States in appreciation for two Canadian musk oxen the Nixons are sending their hosts. The gifts will provide the United States with its first pandas in decades.

Then in the evening the First Lady joined her husband and went to a revolutionary ballet with the wife of Mao Tse-tung.

The ballet was "The Red Detachment of Women," which tells the story of a peasant girl who joins the People's Liberation Army and finds salvation from a tyrannical landlord.

At the Peking Hotel earlier, Mrs. Nixon maintained a tradition of kitchen diplomacy when she nibbled at Chinese delicacies in a spotless kitchen.

The hotel's 115 chefs whipped up goldfish in white sauce, egg rolls in seaweed, steamed baby birds in noonday session.

"The President loves Chinese food," Mrs. Nixon told the wives of top Chinese officials who accompanied her on the kitchen tour. "I'd love to try some of these dishes on my friends but I'm afraid I don't have the right equipment."

She finally turned chopsticks down on further sampling, and said, "All I seem to be doing all day is eating. I don't want to buy all new clothes when I get back."

The President and First Lady were feted Monday night at sumptuous eight-course banquet followed by rounds of toasts.

Mrs. Nixon's visit to the commune affords her the opportunity of seeing one of the pillars of China's program to further the revolution.

A commune is an organization of as many as 100 villages with a population sometimes numbering 50,000 or more. It is a political unit in itself, with its own government, military and judicial systems.

Kickbacks Plague House Buying

WASHINGTON (AP)-The total price a house buyer must pay in many parts of the country to get possession of his new home are run up unreasonably by charges and kickbacks which aren't related to services given, Housing Secretary George Romney says.

Romney also blamed what he called fast-buck artists for many of the woes that have descended on the government's programs to help inner-city residents buy or rent decent housing.

Romney told the House subcommittee on housing Tuesday that state action is needed to get settlement costs down to a reasonable level. And he said the problem of inner-city housing being allowed to go to the government by foreclosure-or simply abandoned-cannot be solved without attention to "all the social, economic and physical problems now afflicting our urban areas."

Quoting from an extensive study of settlement costs commissioned by his Department of Housing and Urban Development and the Veterans Administration, Romney said "costs are unreasonably high in many areas, but not in all."

A major problem, Romney said, is that whatever competition exists in the business of closing residential real estate transactions "is directed toward other participants in the industry and not toward the home-buying public." He continued:

"Lenders compete to get business from realtors or escrow companies. Title companies compete to get business from attorneys, brokers and lenders.

"Frequently, this competition takes the form of an elaborate system of referral fees, kickbacks, or commission...."

The University Day School has 2 spaces available in their afternoon session for pre-schoolers. The Day School is a day care center open to children aged two years nine months to five, whose parents are students or nonprofessional staff in the University.

The teachers try to create learning opportunities for the children. Because the center is subsidized by the Student Senates and by the University, the fee is somewhat reduced: $100 for one semester, four hours a day, five days a week.

Anyone who is interested should feel free to call the Day School (545-2466), or to visit. The school is located in Bowditch Lodge, the small green Four-H lodge on the Southwest corner of campus. (Photo by Gib Fullerton)

Graham Gets Back To Rock

Eight months after the closing of his Fillmore East in New York, rock impressario Bill Graham is moving back into the large-scale production of rock music. Mr. Graham, in association with Tomorrow Productions, Inc., will produce three large concerts-one in May and two next fall-that will be carried via closed circuit television to 70 theaters throughout the country.

After Mr. Graham's disillusioned references to high booking costs, voracious agents and arrogant performers at the time of the Fillmore's closing, his return to a major production enterprise is surprising.

"Consider this my second choice," he said. "If it were possible to put performers into each of these towns personally, that would be my first choice. But it's not possible. There just aren't too many Lunt-Fontannes among major rock stars-performers who are so in love with what they're doing that they will spend a lifetime on the road playing Peoria and Boise and Cucamonga."

Mr. Graham feels that the next logical step in the presentation of rock music will be an effort to make it available, on a large screen, concert-style basis, to audiences who have never before been reached by tours that concentrate on major cities.

"I have great confidence that the technical problems can be solved," he said. "Our job will be to come up with programs that are heavy enough to attract audiences at both the 'live' location and the cable locations. And try to keep the good vibes we had at the Fillmore. I think we can do it."

No doubt Mr. Graham can. But he was more vague about some of the other problems involved in such a large, pioneering undertaking. Will the sound systems in the 80 satellite theaters-not always the same theaters-be adequate for the proper reproduction of rock music? Are there enough performers, even among those who can translate their concert presence into the quite different demands of a large screen? Will it be any easier to deal with arrogant performers and intransigent managers now than it was a year ago?

Mr. Graham is considerably less ebullient in his replies than he might have been a couple of years ago. But he still is the closest thing to a Sol Jurok (or even a Barnum) that the rock generation has produced, and his energy-in action-can be a marvel to behold.

"Look," he said, "this is 1972, and if this is where rock music is right now-and I think it is-then I'd like to see it produced with the same loving concern for detail that we had at the Fillmores in New York and San Francisco. I have said that rock was dead, but I think it's moving into another phase, and I expect to be a part of it."

In May, a little less than a year after the Fillmore East marquee read "Thank You and Farewell," Bill Graham will once again be very much "a part of it." It was a short retirement.

Bar Students Get Standard Exam

WASHINGTON-For the first time in the history of the United States legal profession, candidates for admission to the bar in various states will take the same test when the first multistate bar examination is given to law graduates in 19 states next Wednesday.

The event is being hailed by some lawyers as the first step toward a national admissions standard that would authorize any licensed lawyer to practice in all states. Others are bemoaning it as an erosion of the tradition of local control over local professional standards.

But the trend seems clear, as the number of participating states is expected to rise to 26 by the time the second semi-annual test is given next July.

The test, prepared by the Educational Testing Service in Princeton, N.J., under a $125,000 grant from the American Bar Endowment, is an objective, multiple-choice examination requiring six hours to take and covering five subjects-contracts, criminal law, evidence, real property and torts. Each state will follow with a second day of essay-type questions involving the state's laws and procedures.

Traditionally, the board of bar examiners in each state prepared questions eliciting essay-type answers, and usually stressing the peculiarities of the state's laws. The tests varied greatly in content and difficulty, with New York's test widely regarded as the toughest.

Reformers protested that this system was too archaic for the modern mobile local profession. They also pointed out that uniform laws were erasing many of the differences between states' laws, and the large, highly-rated law schools were teaching standard law to students who intended to practice in many states.

Boltwood Wants Culprit

Friday evening, February 11 at the "Boltwood Sock Hop" on the Amherst College campus, an unidentified person kicked a panel out of the front door of the house. It has since been deemed irreperable by the College Maintainence, and ordered replaced. The house must bear the cost of replacing the door. After paying the costs of the "Hop" the house members feel that our resources are too low to cover the entire cost. We do not want to take any money from the gate receipts, which go to charity, but we may be forced to if we cannot locate the person who caused the damage. Anyone who could give any information as to the identity of the person would be greatly appreciated. Please contact Boltwood House in person, by phone (256-6823), or by mail (62 Boltwood Ave., Amherst).

Belchertown School - A Look Inside

(Editor's Note: The following is the second of a six-part series which was originally printed in the Springfield Union two years ago. The series--"The Tragedy of Belchertown"--was authored by Jim Shanks, staff reporter of the Springfield Union.

Since the original printing of the series, slight changes have taken place at Belchertown. Building A has been changed into a recreation building while the number of men in K Building has been reduced to 65. Also women residents at the school are no longer forced to eat out of pots.

But, as far as changes are concerned at Belchertown, the staff is still undermanned, and many of the residents are still put in an environment in which most people wouldn't even let their dogs live in. It is for this reason the Collegian is reprinting the series.

An interesting aspect of the series is that Dr. M. Phillip Wakstein who is mentioned in the series was fired as regional director of mental retardation for the Department of Mental Health for revealing the inhumane conditions at Belchertown to Shanks.)

In Massachusetts it's a "crime" to be born with less intelligence than the average person.

Belchertown State School for the Feeble Minded proves this. It treats its patients as if they were prisoners in a reformatory.

Every door is heavy. Every door is locked inside and out with a large brass key.

Residents can't walk about the grounds without a pass.

The condition of the institution takes the very humanity away from the school's charges. It forces them to escape into insanity in many cases and to hide the dreary sterility, the stench, the monotony of their existence.

Rep. Alan D. Sisitsky, D-Springfield, was horrified and shaken by his visit to Belchertown.

"The conditions are so shocking that the initial reaction is one of numbness," he said.

Sisitsky claimed that "Dante's 'Abandon hope, all ye who enter here' immediately comes to mind.

Sisitsky blamed the Legislature for the conditions of horror at the institution.

"Since we (the Legislature) appropriate the funds and possess the authority to correct the situation at Belchertown, we are in a sense ultimately responsible for the conditions that exist. To a significant degree the problem is one of financial resources," Sisitsky said.

But the residents of Belchertown--called "children" even though they may be in their 80's--don't vote and can't write their legislators. Lacking political pressure, their needs are generally ignored.

The conditions resulting from Belchertown's position as an administrative stepchild can barely be described. The institution resembles a 19th century "insane asylum" more than a so-called "residential school."

Forty years of neglect have resulted in a stench at some buildings which assaults the senses, makes some visitors so nauseous they enter the hall of a building then retreat hastily back into the open air. Sisitsky did just that.

Mental health commissioners want no memorials to their administration.

These are the buildings few politicians have seen, places where tour groups of "interested citizens" are not taken to visit, wards where the "incurable" are placed and all hope abandoned.

Death is usually the only escape.

About 120 men are warehoused in Building K. The population until recently was 157. Beds are jammed head to foot, a narrow aisle about a foot wide separates each man from his neighbor.

There is no place in the dormitory rooms for personal items and clothing. These are stuffed in cubicles in another small area, everything open for the eyes of others. Dressers have apparently never been heard of.

Privacy anywhere is nonexistent. There are two bathrooms in the ward, each with six toilets, a shower. Repeated showers and attendant humidity cause the ceilings falling in.

The toilets sit side by side, no partitions separating them, no wooden seats for comfort, just cold porcelain to sit on. But the people are retarded and can't protest, so it doesn't make any difference.

Three attendants supervise and care for the 120 residents of Building K, men with the mental abilities of a two-year-old child in the body of a full-grown man. At night there are only two.

The attendants are responsible for getting the men up, showered and dressed each morning. Each attendant handles 40 individuals. They must get the night soilings dumped into the toilets, the laundry and linen sent out, and the residents fed. They are responsible for sorting the bagged laundry when it returns. None are easy tasks.

Until a few months ago the residents of Building K ate, literally, like dogs. All food went into an aluminum pot--soup, meat, vegetables and dessert going into the deep bowl at once.

With great effort and a short staff, the chief attendant worked for more than a year teaching the men to feed themselves. Now everyone eats like a normal person, from a plate with utensils.

Eating is one of the few human appearances maintained in the back ward. In other areas of daily living the men have been dehumanized systematically.

Because of the staff shortage, the men are not trained. During the day they sit on wooded benches, or lie on the floor in strange and grotesque positions, sometimes in pools of their own waste.

The only outside stimulation is a television set boxed into the wall. Sometimes interference makes the picture a rolling blur, but that makes little difference. Their eyes remain glued to the tube.

Many of the men are nude. Some don't want to keep their clothes on. Many have soiled them. Those who have gained weight on the starchy food, worn out the zippers, or had the clasps mangled by the Belchertown laundry, grab desperately with their hands in an often futile attempt to keep their trousers up.

Others are more fortunate. They have pants with elastic tops. These don't have to go half nude. At Belchertown under the pants there is no underwear.

Most of the residents need shaves. Because they are retarded, some with self-destructive tendencies, they can't be given razors. Electric shavers could be used but the legislature doesn't feel that is a necessity.

Across the grounds, on the side used for women, is Building A, the women's back ward. Conditions are about the same, but the women still eat like animals from a pot.

A common practice in the institution was evident, though. Two women were "restained" in the dining room. Restraint is a polite word for tying somebody up.

The attendant said the women "took food from the other residents so we had to tie them up."

One woman was tied in a grotesque and uncomfortable position. One leg was bound to the bench, the other leg was crossed over the first. A rope was tied to her arm, then tied again to the bench. Her other arm was tied behind her to the back of the bench.

The other woman was in a homemade strait jacket, one leg also bound to the bench. A Department of Mental Health official told the attendant the women were illegally restrained. His order was ignored.

Another practice is "seclusion." It's the Belchertown word for solitary confinement.

The walls of the "seclusion rooms" aren't padded. No bucket is provided for human waste. An official commented the residents would rip down the padding anyway.

Seclusion, though, is the only way a resident receives privacy. There is another form of punishment, however. The brighter residents who "give trouble" to the attendants have been known to be relegated to the "back wards."

Anyone walking off the grounds of the institution is considered an "escapee." He is ordered into seclusion for a "minimum of three days" and must wear striped overalls for a month so he can easily be identified. Movie and grounds passes are restricted.

Prison officials no longer use solitary for punishment of escapees anymore.

The worst case of punishment known at the institution recently came to light.

A Springfield man, considered intelligent and able to repair radios and televisions, walked away from the grounds several times. He wasn't attempting escape, just scavenging the town dump for electronics parts.

He was ordered sent to Building K where the "two-year-old men" live for an "indeterminate sentence" as punishment. He was sent into the filth, squalor and monotony of subhuman conditions for exhibiting his intelligence.

This "prisoner" remained in Building K for two years, his plight coming to light only after his family called Dr. Phillip Wakstein, then regional administrator for retardation, to ask why he wasn't allowed home for the Christmas holidays.

Presently the man is out of Belchertown. He spends five days each week in Worcester at a training school and sheltered workshop for vocational training. The other two days he is home with his family in Springfield.

The rules of the department say restraint or seclusion for an escaped resident is illegal. Only special types of restraints—not strips of rags or pillow ticking strait jackets—may be used.

Despite the low pay and the crowded conditions, many staff members have managed to make major contributions to the training and welfare of their charges.

But conditions remain such that a flophouse owner, if he attempted to operate his lodging house in the same manner, would be immediately shut down by the state.

TOMORROW:—Children suffer most at Belchertown.

The Trustee Show

We expect that the trustee meeting today in Boston to be very eventful, maybe even productive. Rumors persisted in this area yesterday that the more interesting parts of the meeting will be happening outside of the trustee meeting room and Saltonstall Building (also known as the State Office Building) in Boston.

The meeting was first moved earlier this week from The Old Mill in Westminster. Supposedly, it's easier to keep outsiders outside of this building. And many outsiders are expected.

A group offering support for Ms. Frieda Salzman will be protesting against the trustees. Ms. Salzman is expected to accept (with reservation) an offer for her reinstatement made by Chancellor Broderick (UMass-Boston) late last week. She will also denounce the University's practices regarding sex discrimination and the trustees' secret actions.

On the agenda a report from the Joint Ad Hoc Committee on Counseling, Advising and Support Services is scheduled. (We understand that this is Dr. Gage's committee on counseling programs for minority groups.) Early rumor says that this report will call for such sweeping changes that some of the trustees won't understand it. Also, a dispute over its acceptance may develop between Dr. Broderick, who doesn't like it, and President Wood, who does like it. Since Chancellors may only speak at trustee meetings by the invitation of the President, Dr. Broderick might not have much to say there today.

Another group, made up mostly of Veterans, are expected to protest the trustee's decision to void the ban on military recruitment at the Boston campus.

Student Senator Larry Ladd termed today's meeting surrealistic. We shall see.

We certainly hope that the trustees are not planning to bar all young looking people (except of course, for the student trustees) which is another rumor that has come our way.

We would like to hope that today's meeting will prove to be productive and not just a show.

Hot Term Papers

WASHINGTON--One of the biggest businesses in this country right now seems to be the production and sale of college term papers. Described by New York Atty. Gen. Lefkowitz as a multimillion dollar industry, the selling of term papers, essays and theses has made it possible for many college students to pass courses and earn degrees never dreamed of 20 years ago.

While there has been criticism of this by some educators, my friend Elias Flimflam of the Institute of Instant Plagiarism defends the practice of buying and selling term papers as essential to a modern education.

"The term paper industry not only gives college students an opportunity to participate in a great capitalist enterprise," he said, "but it provides jobs for thousands of moonlighting professors and graduate instructors. If you cut out the sale of term papers and require students to write their own, many teachers would be unable to afford to remain in our schools."

"But," I said, "Atty. Gen. Lefkowitz is trying to outlaw term paper companies on the grounds that students are obtaining degrees by fraudulent means."

"Nonsense. All the term paper companies are doing is providing a service to students that wasn't available a few years ago. Most college students have too much to do when they're in school. The pressures are great and as the work load increases they become more and more depressed. This leads to anger and alienation from the mainstream of our society.

"If they can purchase a term paper or an essay or even a thesis and hand it in as their own, these students are happy, and they don't want to tear down the system any more.

"The question the attorney general must ask himself is does he want contented students who don't do their own work, or does he want an honest homework program that could tear this country apart?"

"Is there any danger that if students cheat in school they will continue to cheat in life?"

"Cheating is a very strong word," my friend said. "Let's say that Prof. Applebaum assigns a paper on 'The Abstract Theory of Solid Gas.' This might require 10 hours of research in the library, plus three hours of writing, not to mention typing fees. It takes the student two hours to find a parking place near the library, and another two hours reading magazines before he gets around to the research. This adds up. It's time that could be must better spent exchanging important ideas with other people in the student union, or playing touch football against another fraternity.

"The problem we have to address ourselves to is, why are kids in school? Is it to get an education which they will never use, or a degree which will open up a new world for them?"

Flimflam continued earnestly, "What we do is take the sweat out of college. By selling term papers to students we are removing competition from the classroom. Thanks to us it's possible for a mediocre student to compete with a brilliant student on his own level.

"For as little as $10 an ineffectual student no longer has to worry about the person sitting next to him getting a better grade. If this isn't a service to mankind, I don't know what is."

"You make a convincing case for the sale of term papers," I agreed, "but what happens when the student gets out of school and starts his profession? He could make a lousy doctor, lawyer or engineer, if he bought all his work in college."

"It's a good point, and we've been concerned about it. So what we're doing is starting a post-graduate service. We plan to sell lawyer's briefs, doctor's diagnoses and engineering blueprints to anyone who wants to continue his education once he gets out of school."

On Amateurism

How much would you pay to watch Marina Rodriguez perform on the balance beam suspended across the Grand Canyon or perhaps to see Jim Graves race a kangaroo over the 120-yard high hurdles? Where does Jim Ryun end and Evel Kneivel begin? What's the difference between circus performers and athletes? I think the difference is between commercialism and professionalism. I'll explain.

Marina risking her neck over the Grand Canyon 6 years from now because the baby's crying and she needs a buck; after all, she is a good gymnast, is commercialism. She would not be allowed to compete in the next Olympics and, she could very easily break her neck. But, if she wore a shirt in her next competition that said Tony Vacca's Mobile station and got 25 dollars for it, that's professionalism. If she fell off the beam she would lose one point not her life, but she still would not be able to compete in the next Olympics because of America's multi-millionaire Avery Brundage.

Professionalism is, as I define it here, a freedom on the part of the athlete to make his living any way he wants, to advertise products, to be financed by business or to work at a job other than his sport and still be able to compete. So anyone can participate in Olympic and other international competitions so long as he proves, by a simple chromosome test (46) that he is human.

So far, it's pretty simple: open competition for all people. But, what will keep out the exploitation of athletes when money can be had staging contests? Profiteering! An insurance is needed for the athlete to protect them from what Ed Bryant calls "Slave labor in Sapporo." There must be a protection from the commerical exploitation of athletes by contest promoters which may take on a circus-entertainment gladiator format. For example:

1. Excessive prize money offered for extraordinary competitions, Grand Canyon stunts, should be prohibited.
2. Some sort of profit-sharing on a percentage basis of gate receipts for athletes. A large percentage...50%?
3. Legalized gambling on all athletes events. (This will insure a greater turnout to increase gate receipts and player's income so he will not need to fix competitions. It goes anyway illegally.)
4. Profit-sharing by officials also.
5. A tax on profits to be used for research on sport, physiology, drugs, and kenisiology.
6. Boards of directors for the different hereto "Amateur" sports composed equally of current competing athletes and promoters.
7. A recreation tax on profits to promote competitions on an open public developmental level to provide opportunities for all people to participate in sport.

In these ways, athletes can seize control of their bodies to prevent their exploitation and still the best athletes can meet and not have to worry about falling into the Grand Canyon.

Stomachs Unite!

By MARK VOGLER

Have you dining commons critics got something to beef about? You're darn tooting you do. After all, the food leaves much to be desired. The glasses and utensils (particularly in Worcester) need a darn good once over with a dish rage, not to mention the coke machine that splatters cough syrup in your cup.

The jello serves as an adequate stomach settler, for one it's in your stomach, your stomach can't move. And how about those milk machines when they run dry--those in a rush have to drink their cow juice vicariously. Students often scorn those "special" nights when the dessert often takes the place of the main course.

You can tell that the bread just came out of mothball reserves. And talk about basic foods, the only thing that is basic is a simplified mess. And once you've finished a fine meal, you need a traffic director in order to deposit your tray and maneuver your way out the door.

Although grossly satirized, there are unpleasant conditions of this sort prevalent in the University dining commons.

Aside from all this madness, meet a more menacing threat to the well being of the dining common patrons. They come in droves and they're a double dosage of the problems that plague students in their everyday quest for a decent and civilized meal. They're worth writing a book about--maybe as an opposite version of George Orwell's Animal Farm.

The worst part about it, they're of the student, by the student, and against the student as honest Abe would chime in. They're small in number, but are more so a nemesis than the malfunctions of the dining commons. The only way to describe them is inconsiderate, mannerless, and annoying.

Maybe you bumped into one today while you were trying to get through the obstacle course without losing your tray. Perhaps some galute cut in front of you or reached his paw over your shoulder in order to beat you to the punch for seconds while you courteously permitted people waiting for firsts to move on.

Ever lose your salt or pepper off your table without the asking? The infantile behavior of loudmouths and chemists who like to concoct new formulas with their food is certainly a sight to behold. And you sure can't exclude those Frito-Banditos who love to hoard anything from bread and milk to silverware and dishes.

The lack of respect and impatience for the people who work in the dc's is one valid reason for the irritable old crabs that greet you from behind the counters. There ought to be a law for those lazy students who don't bring their trays to the washroom. Yes, how about devising a parking fine for their kind?

Isn't it ironic that you get out of life what you put into it? And this very well applies to the situation at hand. After all, if students want to act like animals, shouldn't they get treated as such? The quality of the food and service indeed have their shortcomings. But they've got some legitimate excuses--investigate and you'll find them. But what are the alibis of you lunchline lunatics?

What's the matter, has the cat got your tongue? Or are you stuffing your face with the very "slop" you curse at? Think about it the next time you're in the dining commons bickering about the meals or the service. It's certainly food for thought.

'I THINK YOU'RE SUPPOSED TO THROW IT BACK TO HIM.'

Letters To The Editor

Insurance Needs? Bah!

To the Editor:

My students and I have read with interest the recent series of articles and letters in the Daily Collegian on life insurance. This reply should have been written earlier, but each succeeding edition of the Daily Collegian shed more humor than light on the subject and we didn't want to stop the flow of laughs. First, a brief comment on each of the two articles and the first letter.

It's true, the Consumer's Union article is devoted primarily to a condemnation of campus selling practices rather than to the topic suggested by the title, "Students Don't Need Life Insurance". Nevertheless, the selling of an over-priced (in relation to the need of the consumer) policy to clients with little need for life insurance should be censored, and the agent who compounds this problem by putting pressure on the poorly-informed student to borrow to purchase the largely-unneeded policy should be boiled in oil. Admittedly, companies such as Fidelity Union and College Life are safe and efficiently managed, and the policies may be fairly priced. But these polices are loaded with "goodies" (which proved to be "badies" for the student), resulting in a very high-priced policy. It's analogous to selling Cadillacs with every option to a student who really needs nothing more than a bicycle.

Mr. Nathan, the agents' association spokesman, criticizes the above Consumers Union article since it is written by an "organization that earns its living by rating and ranking hair dryers..", then proceeds to devote one-third of his article to a quote from Better Homes and Garden, a magazine "that earns its living" from writing about flower arrangements and the growing of carrots. However, the crux of his article is contained in the sentence which condemns the Consumers Union article for failing to mention "one valid reason why a young man or woman should not invest (underlining supplied by this author) in life insurance". Too many life insurance agents, on and off the campus, over emphasize the role of life insurance as an investment in contrast with the more important role of providing protection. In many ways, life insurance is a poor investment, but no other financial arrangement can provide the vital protection available with life insurance. The word "invest", used by Mr. Nathan, suggests the selling to students of policies with a large investment element. Even if students do need life insurance, they seldom should purchase high-priced policies with a substantial investment element. Mr. Bouchette's letter is so loaded with contradictions and misinformation it is difficult to evaluate with less than a detailed line-by-line analysis.

In summary, the main mission of life insurance, as stated in the Consumers Union article, is to protect families against the loss of income caused by the premature death of the bread winner. Most students are not bread winners, nor do they have a wife or children dependent upon the. Consequently, the majority of students are not in dire need of "investing in a life insurance policy". The married student with children does need life insurance and this need may be critical. But the low income of the typical married student argues against the purchase of the investment policy (whole life or 20-pay life) so often recommended. Such a student should buy a term policy at one-third or one-fourth the price of a whole life policy.

The married student with no children is often supported by a working wife. If either member of the couple needs life insurance in this case, it may be the wife and not the student husband. The single student with debts may need life insurance to repay the loans in the event of death, or the student may wish to relieve parents of the expenses associated with death by purchasing a small policy. However, almost all students are subject to a loss of health which may prevent them from purchasing life insurance when needed. Protection against this problem may be obtained by a supplementary rider to a regular policy which provides that insurance up to five or six times the amount of the base policy may be purchased in the future at regular rates, without regard to the health of the policy holder at the time of purchase. But even this very desirable protection can be purchased in conjunction with a $10,000 policy for approximately $75 a year, rather than the $300 package which is too often foisted upon the unsuspecting, uninformed student.

Oh yes, my students insisted that this note be concluded by reminding all that the best protection against ignorance is knowledge. Vital knowledge pertinent to insurance may be obtained by enrolling in FINANCE 230 Principles of Insurance and FINANCE 231 Life Insurance.

In Defense Of

(Editor's Note: The following article first appeared in the Hartford Courant, Feb. 13, 1972. It was brought to our attention in defense of Mr. Ronald J. Nathan's criticism of a Consumer's Union report.)

By ROBERT S. ROSEFSKY

In preparing for my forthcoming special series on life insurance which will be published in just a few weeks I've been keeping a keener eye than usual for items on that subject. One such just came to light, and I thought it worthy of mention outside of the series.

It was an article in the January issue of Consumer Reports entitled "Caveat Emptor on Campus," and it dealt with the sale of life insurance to college students. CU's view on the subject, stated very bluntly by them, was "Don't buy."

The article quite amazed me in its lack of objectivity and almost complete one-sidedness. Regretfully, it might cause me to look upon their future efforts with a bit less trust than I had previously had.

I quite agree with them that the buyer of insurance of any kind should beware, and also should be aware. Whether college student or workingman, the prospective buyer should know his own needs (present and anticipated), should study carefully the details of the plan and compare it with other possible plans and should know the reputation of the company and agent with whom he is working.

But I must take issue with their virtual condemnation of college students buying life insurance under any circumstances. At the age of roughly 21, a young man's health (and thus his insurability) is at its peak, and the rates for life insurance will never be lower for him. This factor was totally ignored in the article.

I'm not pushing life insurance. I'm just urging clear thinking and a fair look at both sides of the coin. I appreciate being told when I've been guilty of not doing so. Maybe CU will too.

Consider This

To the Editor:

I would urge you the concerned voter or the non-voter to consider this article.

There is a Congressman, Representative Paul McCloskey from California, though little known, who dares speak out against the injustices that the government has committed against the American people, our environment, and the world.

Mr. McCloskey does not use the same liberal rhetoric as his colleagues; he does not seek quests that are unattainable, but; sets his goals high, and demands greatness from the American Public. He is not running a campaign based upon charisma, or popularity, but on facts and issues, with solutions to these issues.

Paul McCloskey needs the help of you the American people both young and old, voter and non-voter to help in his drive to obtain the Republican nomination for President.

Put an end to the Nixon Administration's lies, and place faith in an honest man dedicated to his beliefs, and bold enough to oppose his party's encumbent, the President of the United States. Join the bandwagon support Paul McCloskey for the nomination in the New Hampshire primaries on March 7th. He needs each and every one of you for support. Please come out and work for a candidate who has Peace, Love and Freedom as major issues. See you in New Hampshire.

Editorial Points

Changing the menu won't alter the fact that every night is Polish Night at the Dining Commons.

Maybe the food would have tasted better if it had been made on the $18,000 granite table that's used for pizzas in the Hatch.

While we're on the subject of the Dining Commons, let us make a suggestion for the next special meal. In honor of President Nixon and his adventures, it would be nice to have eggroll and chowmein-perhaps a little caviar. And how about Vodka to wash it all down with?

We hope that the Trustees won't let a ruling on the Salzman case ruin their lunch today.

The best part about Polish Night was that there were no seconds.

Today's trustee meeting was moved to Boston because it is easier to police.

If heavy snow can cause the elimination of pizzas from the Campus Center menus, think what sunshine could do to the dining commons menu.

Control Your Body

To the Editor:

Will Massachusetts women have the right to control their bodies? Tomorrow at 9:00 a.m. open hearings begin before the Social Welfare Committee in the Gardner Auditorium of the State House in Boston. These hearings cover a bill introduced by Senators Jack Backmen and Royal Bolling to repeal Massachusett's repressive anti-abortion laws. The first hour legislators will debate, and successive alternating hours will hear pro and con debates from the floor. Many women from New England are attending to fight for the bill which will be later voted on by the House and Senate. Groups such as WONAAC, MORAL, and PSC will be at the State House en masse.

Last March 23rd, a Boston Globe poll revealed that 62% of the Massachusetts voters wanted the anti-abortion laws repealed, but the bill was defeated in the male, Catholic dominated House and Senate. It is time women controlled their bodies.

The bill introduced Feb. 22nd to repeal contraceptive laws will be voted on in March, as is also likely for the abortion bill. If you cannot be at the State House Thursday, please write to your legislator and the Social Welfare Committee. There is still time to be heard before the vote in March.

Shades of 1984

To the Editor:

How much control does the State have over your life? The State does possess many regulatory powers which determine individual behavior. However there are built-in mechanisms that do provide citizens with a voice in governmental affairs. One of these mechanisms is the Public Hearing of a bill.

A Legislative bill can be submitted by any citizen of the Commonwealth. The sponsor brings his bill to his local Representative who is required to see that it is formally submitted. The bill is then deiegated to the appropriate committee, either in the House or Senate. An appointed date is set for a hearing on the bill.

The hearings are open to the public and anyone interested in a particular bill can testify in front of the Legislative Committee in favor or in opposition to that bill. In this way Legislators have the chance to get the public's view on the issue in question.

In order that students be informed of what bills will be coming up for hearings, USCC will publish weekly a list of hearings for the forecoming week. Any student that has any interest in any bill can and should attend the hearing. USCC also has copies of all the bills filed for the legislative session. These are available in RSO office 123.

Do Something!

To the Editor:

How often have you left a dining commons and thought how delicious the meal was? Food quality is one of the biggest gripes that students on this campus have. You shrug your shoulders and wonder, "What can I do?" Use your crying stomachs as inspiration towards improving food quality. We need people to work and uncover ripoffs and to rectify them. Everyone bitches, but no one is willing to do anything. The committee began last fall with fifty people. Where have you all gone? At our last meeting we had five people. There is too much to be done and five people can't do it all. Our aim is to improve the food and maybe even find ways to save us all money; but we need help. So grab your roommate and come to our next meeting. Stop griping and do something!

Darity Named To Drug Council

Dr. William A. Darity, head of the UMass Department of Public Health, has been named to a new National Drug Abuse Council set up by four leading foundations.

The council has been established to provide information, evaluation, research and leadership in the drug abuse field. Four foundations--Ford, Carnegie, the Commonwealth Fund and the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation-- have pledged $2.5 million for the council's first year. They are expected to invest from $10 to $15 million in the council over the next ten years.

The select 15-member council includes Dr. Albert Bowker, chancellor of the University of California at Berkeley; Dr. Daniel Freedman, head of the University of Chicago psychiatry department; William R. Hewlett, president of Hewlett-Packard Co.; Eleanor Holmes Norton, chairman of the New York City Commission on Human Rights; J. Henry Smith, president of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of America; and other nationally-known leaders. Bethuel M. Webster, a past president of the New York City Bar Association, is chairman.

Dr. Darity has been at UMass since 1965 and head of the Public Health Department since 1969. He received his Ph. D. degree from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and spent 10 years with the World Health Organization, a specialized agency of the United Nations, before joining the UMass staff. He is presently affiliated with several voluntary organizations, including the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, the Sex Information and Education Council of the U.S. (SIECUS), the Society of Public Health Educators, the Massachusetts Tuberculosis and Respiratory Disease Association, the Hampshire County Public Health Association, and the American Public Health Association.

Dr Darity has delivered papers before many different organizations and has had publications in both national and international health journals. His main research area is attitudes and barriers to family planning.

Lowenstein Will Give Speech

Allard Lowenstein, the man who talked Eugene McCarthy into running for the Presidency in 1968, will speak tonight at 8 p.m. in Project 10 on "The 1972 Election: The Issues and the Candidates." All interested persons are invited.

Lowenstein, a former Congressman and currently the national chairman of the Americans for Democratic Action, has been spending much time recently in New Hampshire, following the candidates and working with student groups.

A former President of the National Student Association (before its C.I.A. funding), Lowenstein was once Dean of Students at Stanford University and is a graduate of Yale Law School.

The meeting is in the Main Lounge of the Project, in Pierpont House, on the southwest corner of Southwest Residential College. Lowenstein is a Guest Fellow of Project 10 this semester.

Sex For The Halibut

AUBURN, Ala. (AP) — Like people, fish have their sex problems, says Dr. Wayne Shell, and sometimes that's the reason they won't bite.

They'll stop eating, maybe two or three weeks at a time. And they're grouchy.

"Sex problems worry them," says Shell, a professor in the fisheries department at Auburn University.

As a matter of fact, he said in an interviews, "they do a lot of things like people. They change their feeding habits. They get angry. They worry a lot about their enemies; bass do, particularly. And they run for cover when a storm hits."

Take salmon, for instance. They feed voraciously at sea, Shell says, but when they start their sex migration upriver in the spawning season, they stop eating.

Other species, such as bass, do the same. When they're "on the bed" guarding the eggs, they'll go without food until the new arrivals are hatched.

Shell and others on the fisheries staff headed by Dr. H.S. Swingle have spent years on marine research and have traveled around the world teaching hungry people to grow fish for food.

They have learned a lot about the things fish do and why they do them. But they don't have any sure-fire answers for the inquiring sportsmen who try to figure out how to land the big ones with rod and reel.

Financial Aid

Financial Aid applications for the Summer of 1972 and the 1972-73 academic year are now available in the Financial Aid Office, Room 232, Whitmore.

Applications will be available from now until 5:00 P.M., Tuesday, February 29 and must be filed no later than March 1. Whether or not aid has been received previously, a new application must be filed each year for all Loans, Scholarships, Grants and Work Study.

Records For Registration

In an attempt to motivate young people to register and vote, A&M RECORDS will be releasing a special double LP record set to be used as an incentive item for the voter registration campaign. The LP, which will be distributed in early March, contains select cuts from A&M's recent releases, featuring such artists as Cat Stevens and Carpenters.

The LP will be free to anyone with a voter registration receipt, and will be available at many of the voter registration booths, or through the mail.

A&M will also be releasing a special voter registration single in March entitled "Use the Power (18)", which will be sent to DJ's all across the country. A&M presently includes a register to vote slogan in its advertising.

The voter registration drive is being co-ordinated through Andrew Meyer, director of the college promotion department at A&M RECORDS.

LOSE 20 POUNDS IN TWO WEEKS!

Famous U.S. Women Ski Team Diet

During the non-snow off season the U.S. Women's Alpine Ski Team members go on the "Ski Team" diet to lose 20 pounds in two weeks. That's right – 20 pounds in 14 days! The basis of the diet is chemical food action and was devised by a famous Colorado physician especially for the U.S. Ski Team. Normal energy is maintained (very important!) while reducing. You keep "full" – no starvation – because the diet is designed that way! It's a diet that is easy to follow whether you work, travel or stay at home.

This is, honestly, a fantastically successful diet. If it weren't, the U.S. Women's Ski Team wouldn't be permitted to use it! Right? So, give yourself the same break the U.S. Ski Team gets. Lose weight the scientific, proven way. Even if you've tried all the other diets, you owe it to yourself to try the U.S. Women's Ski Team Diet. That is, if you really do want to lose 20 pounds in two weeks. Order today. Tear this out as a reminder.

Send only $1.00 ($1.25 for Rush Service) – cash is O.K. – to: Ski Team Diet, P.O. Box 15493, Dept. ST, San Diego, Calif. 92115

Don't order unless you expect to lose 20 pounds in two weeks! Because that's what the Ski Team Diet will do!

Holyoke Horse Show Held

By MAUREEN MEISTER

A horse show is going to be held at Mount Holyoke College next Sunday, and the public is invited to both watch and participate. The show will begin at 10 Sunday morning in the indoor riding ring, and is expected to continue until four in the afternoon. Spectators will be welcome at any time during the day.

Instead of having the usual professionals, riding clubs, or stables sponsor the show, students from the Mount Holyoke Boots and Saddles Club are organizing the program entirely by themselves. Show chairman is Barbara Jensen.

The Open Horse Show is the second one to be held at Mount Holyoke College since September. Three shows are held at Holyoke each year, and the next one won't be held until spring.

The show itself will be divided into seventeen different types of competitions which are called classes. Each class involves a different talent and a different level of skill. One, called "Maiden Equitation", is only open to those riders who have not yet won a single blue ribbon in an equitation class. Riders entering this class are only required to walk, trot, and canter.

Other classes require considerably more skill, however, and they should offer greater appeal to those who have come to watch.

One class is descriptively called "Knock Down and Out". Each contestant jumps his horse over as many fences as he can, until the horse has finally knocked down a fence. The challenge is that the fences are arranged so that they become progressively higher as the horse continues. No judging will really be required for this competition as the winner will be determined simply by seeing which horse cam jump the highest in the series of fences.

Another competition which promises to be interesting for spectators is called "Open Handy Hunter". It too tests jumping ability, but the style of the jump is more important than the height reached. Each horse is required to jump over a course of eight fences which are placed at angles to each other. The fences are all only three feet high, but the quick turns which the horse must make requires a different kind of coordination from that which is needed for high jumps. The outcome of this contest, like the majority of the contests, will be determined by the verdict of the judge, Frank Flynn. For each competition, six ribbons will be awarded.

Those interested in entering the show must register at least one class period before the contest in which they wish to compete.

The Boots and Saddles Club emphasizes that it is anxious to have people from other colleges and the community attend and participate in its second Open Horse Show of the year.

Dick And Jane Become Victims

NEW YORK-"When we show our slides and make our speeches, we make an impact," Joan Bartl said, fanning herself with a thin, report- "Dick and Janes as Victims."

If you have a daughter, the slides, the speeches and the report from the women on words and wisdom task force of central New Jersey NOW (National Organization for Women) may be of more than passing interest

"Women usually are shocked," Ms. Bartl of Princeton, N.J., said in an interview. "What we are exposing is concrete sexism in 134 elementary school books."

The green-covered report, in progress since 1970, contains an analysis of sex stereotyping in school books.

"Girls are damaged by this," Ms. Bartl said, "but so are boys. They are taught that they can't be sissies or cry and that they must always be strong."

The school books from 14 major publishing companies were selected from among those in three suburban New Jersey towns.

"Dick and Jane as Victims," shows that "the typical girl in any reader is a frilly little thing with a smile on her pretty face and a passive attitude toward life."

And the boy? As the readers portray him, he's one "with a look of stern concentration."

"He is busy preparing to be a man."

"At specific issue," Ms. Bartl said, "is the way in which girls are portrayed...the activities in which they engage, the attitudes they display, the way in which people treat them, the generalizations which are made about them...as contrasted with the treatment of boys."

Statistics cited by the task force and based on an analysis of 2760 stories in the 134 books are as follows:

Boy-centered stories to girl-centered stories, 5 to 2; adult male main characters to adult female main characters, 3 to 1; male biographies to female animal stories, 2 to 1; male folk or fantasy stories to female folk or fantasy stories, 4 to 1.

"Particularly appalling is the scarcity of female biographical stories," the task force noted, "there are 27 stories about only 17 different women, whereas there are 119 stories about 88 men.

An analysis of content of stories, according to the task force, shows clever girls 33 times. But clever boys show up 131 times.

The task force also found what it describes as "the second sex theme: nice girls finish last."

Struggling For Self-Determination

By GILBERT J. SALK

One of the major problems we face in attempting to make changes in our lives is the fact that we are constantly confronted with huge, faceless, nameless institutions. We find over and over again that there are no responsible people, no avenues of appeal, no guides.

It's not really a matter of some malevolent force plotting to rob us of our freedom; instead, it's the crushing weight of expediency, efficiency, and bureaucracy. People who want to move against the flow get swept under because they don't have the skills to fight the current, which moves ahead blindly and inexorably.

What is needed is new tools, new strengths, new information, new communication. We all share many frustrations, be they about school, jobs, interpersonal relations, materialism, sexuality, boredom, or any of a thousand other possibilities. For most of us, that frustration is ultimately a very lonely thing. We feel it as our own problem, and don't have access to ways out.

The first step out is the realization that the loneliness is self-imposed, that there are others sharing our frustrations, and that we may find ways to join with them to work through the problems. If we can create for ourselves a kind of support group (or series of support groups) then we no longer have to fight the current alone.

If we can find others who have worked out their own paths, and can demonstrate success, that will add to our strength. If we can learn that we can make demands as individuals or small groups, and that our demands have legitimacy over and above the demands of institutions (because we are the people the institutions were created to serve) then we can push aside negative responses until we have our needs met.

This requires the willingness to ignore negative responses, or at least to remain undiscouraged by them, a service which support groups can greatly assist with.

Support groups also provide a means of pooling information. For example, suppose you're into communes. With a support group, you can immediately pool the factual information you already have, and at the same time pool the questions you have. After sharing the task of getting the answers together, your list of unknowns about things such as land purchasing, farming, building, maintenance, group norms, finances, animals, child-raising, etc., is greatly reduced. And with the unknowns reduced, your own internal strength to deal with setbacks and frustrations will be greater.

All of this is building up to a proposal. Some people have spoken to me about a possible information clearinghouse for alternatives. It will collect and disperse information on who's into what kinds of things, who has info to share, who needs advice, what alternatives are being tried or who wants to experiment, and similar things. The idea sounds good to me, and I'd be willing to put some time into it if the interest is there.

This would provide a kind of support group for support groups, helping people get together with other people and with information. If anyone is interested in putting some time and effort into an idea like this, get in touch with me and let's sit and rap for awhile. I can usually be found in the draft counselling office in 923 Campus Center during the day. Stop by.

INTERESTING SPEAKER

For those of you interested in the back to the land movement, or just interested in one person's experience with alternative lifestyles, a true pioneer will be on campus next week. Mildred Loomis has been into homesteading and communes since the 40s. She is the editor of Green Revolution, a magazine put out by a Maryland commune and dealing with cultural alternatives. She'll be speaking Tuesday, Feb. 29, in 162 CC at 7:30 p.m. under the sponsorship of this column and the United Christian Foundation. I invite you all to come.

PEACE.

Bill Veeck, author of "Veeck-Is A Wreck", will speak in the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 8 P.M. Mr. Veeck has been on the circuit many years, and maybe can fill you in on some details of your past baseball greats.

Meet A Maverick Tonight

Baseball's "incorrigible maverick", Bill Veeck, the former owner of three major league teams, comes to the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 8 p.m. under the auspices of the Distinguished Visitors Program.

The topic of Mr. Veeck's lecture will be "Veeck-As In Wreck."

Baseball fans will never forget the day a midget came up to bat in an American League game. In fact, Bill Veeck may well go down in history merely for that moment in 1951 when he sent Eddie Gaedel in for the St. Louis Browns in asurprise move that rocked the park.

But Bill Veeck's team-winning record stands a good chance of being remembered too. When he took over the Cleveland Indians, they went on to win the American League pennant and the World Series in 1948, setting an all-time baseball attendance record of over 2 1/2 million. He also achieved an American League "first" by hiring a Black outfielder, Larry Doby. Later he brought in the oldest rookie in baseball history, the 48-year-old Black pitcher LeRoy(Satchel) Paige.

After selling the Indians and the Browns, Veeck bought into the Chicago White Sox, another team that won the American League pennant for him in 1959. The Chicago Cubs and Milwaukee Brewers are two other clubs with which he has been associated.

A promoter with a flair for entertaining the fans (he introduced the exploding scoreboard), Bill Veeck now devotes much of his time to writing. An injury received as a marine in World War II cost him a leg but dampened none of his enthusiasm and vigor. He makes frequent appearances on ABC-TV's "Wide World of Sports." He also has a syndicated five-minute, five-day-a-week radio show of sports comment, "Bill Veeck Views the World of Sports." His syndicated columns and book reviews appear in newspapers throughout the country in such cities as Chicago, Denver, Detroit, Cleveland and Baltimore. The Saturday Evening Post, Esquire, Sports Illustrated and Reader's Digest are but a few of the magazines that have carried his by-line.

The Phillips Academy (Andover), Los Alamos School and Kenyon College-educated author has also published an autobiography, "Veeck--As In Wreck," and (with Ed Linn) "The Hustler's Handbook," a colorful and entertaining book on baseball and promotion. He has a well-earned reputation as an outspoken critic of "stodgy" baseball management.

In November of 1968, Bill Veeck became President and Chief Executive of Suffolk Downs, the Boston racetrack. As Arthur Daley of the New York Times put it, "Now horse-racing, which desperately needs crowd-appealing showmanship, has the master of the art!" Veeck resigned this post in 1971.

A native of Illinois who now resides in Maryland, Bill Veeck is married to a former publicity director of Ice Capades. They have a large family and have traveled so much around the country that each of their children was born in a different state.

Teach At Day School

The University Day School has several spaces available to their teaching team program, at various times in the week. The Day School offers an educational day care program for pre-school children of University students and staff.

The teams teach either once or twice a week, in four hour sessions, and also meet for one hour planning groups. The teams are made up of students from Human Development and Education, as well as Psychology, Sociology and other departments. Some of the team members receive pay from work study, while others receive credit, either from their own department, or from Modular Credit. Anyone interested in joining a teaching team should call the School, 545-2466. Team teachers generally find their assignment hard work, but they also insist that it's good work.

Paris Chamber Orchestra Will Play Here Next Week

The Paul Kuentz Chamber Orchestra of Paris will appear at the UMass-Amherst for two concerts under the auspices of the UMass Fine Arts Council.

The concerts scheduled for Monday and Tuesday, Feb. 28 and 29, in Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. will introduce one of France's most distinguished ensembles to Connecticut Valley audiences.

The Orchestra has traveled extensively throughout the world, with a repertoire which spans three centuries, from 17th century Vivaldi to 20th-century masters such as Albert Roussel.

In this tour, the Paul Kuentz Chamber Orchestra will be joined by soloists, Barbara Schlick, soprano, and Jean-Francois Dion, on trumpet.

Two different programs will be offered at UMass. Monday, Feb. 28, the program will include Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik;" Vivaldi's Concerto for Four Violins and Orchestra; Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen" by Bach; Fanfares from the Suite No. 1 by Jean-Joseph Mouret; and "Sinfonietta" by Albert Roussel.

The concluding concert, Tuesday, Feb. 29, will include Handel's Concerto Grosso in C Major ("Alexander's Feast"); Bach's Concerto for Violin in A Major; Scarlatti's Cantata for Solo Voice and Trumpet "Sy le sponde del Tebro;" Concerto for Trumpet, Strings and Harpsichord in D Major; and Serenade for Strings by the contemporary composer, Daniel Lesur.

Reserved tickets for the concerts are available by contacting the Fine Arts Council, 125 Herter Hall, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Mass. 01002, telephone 545-0202. Remaining tickets will be available at Bowker Box Office one hour prior to each concert.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Libra is innately shy. These persons are powerhouses, but they hold back, often giving the appearance of being weak. But Libra can plan and can succeed no matter what the obstacles, if you want my counsel, don't bet against Libra. Some famous persons born under this fascinating zodiacal sign include Johnny Carson, Charlton Heston and Rex Reed.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You gain recognition from surprise source. What appears a setback can boomerang in your favor. You are able to finish, to find your own style and hear your own voice. Check household requirements.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): New approach required in dealing with close relatives. Assert yourself; be honest about your needs. Stress independence without being arrogant. You get benefit of new deal. Take advantage of it.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Money situation is activated. You succeed if capable of rising above petty details. Otherwise, there is delay with possibility of loss. Choice is your own. Brooding, jealousy are destructive.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You reach agreement with one who opposed you. Stress versatility. Have alternatives at hand. Be willing to expand. Standing still will not add to security. Legal decision is due to rebound in your favor.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Maintain steady pace. You are able to eliminate wasteful procedures. Those who were aided in past will return the favor. Obstacles are overcome. Maintain balance and dedication. You can achieve.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Friends provide chance for you to make change and progress. Some wishes are fulfilled. Avoid the sensational. Be analytical and selective. Accent is on coming to terms with member of opposite sex. Do so.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): What appeared a loss could boomerang in your behalf. You are concerned with goals and how ambitions affect domestic situation. Key is to keep harmony at home. Diplomatic approach results in co-operation.

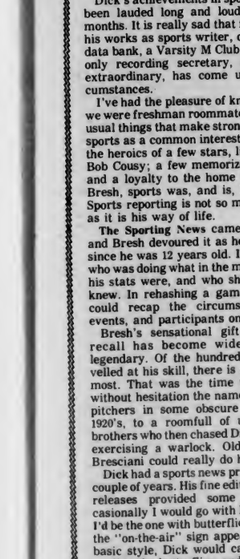
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You could experience change of philosophy. Message from distant place has much to do with your thinking. See persons, situations in light of reality. Places is involved. Stop deceiving yourself.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): More responsibility is due. You also get chance to improve financial status. Accept special or overtime assignment. Family money discussion is in order. Those in authority will back you.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Recognize end of situation or relationship. Finish rather than initiate project. Don't fail for sob story. You have right to life of your own. Message will become increasingly clear.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You gain access to valuable information. Leo aids. Be receptive. Throw aside false pride. Do what must be done-and do it efficiently. Visit one who is confined to home, hospital. Strive for greater self-confidence.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Follow through on hunch. Learn by teaching. Means share knowledge. Friend may mean well but also could be misinformed. Stick to game plan. Aquarian will offer interesting proposition. Consider carefully.



IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are perceptive, creative, attractive to opposite sex. This could be a banner year. You gain emotionally and financially with September indicated as outstanding month. You have ability to seek and obtain facts and put them together in fascinating manner.

Reflections:

Richard L. Bresciari

Dick Bresciani was fired from his position as Assistant Director of Sports Information at the University of Massachusetts. The person who fired him tired at first of pass it off as an economy move. Later when this ruse wouldn't wash, the same person drummed up one lame excuse after another.

Many have come to Dick's aid to try to reverse this decision--a decision fast becoming known as one of the worst personnel actions ever. Earle Barroll's fine recap and search for the facts behind the incident is one of the more recent, fair, and yet, apparently fruitless quests for the rationale of this disgusting blunder. (See Collegian November 15, 1971.)

In any case, Dick's dismissal is one of the most disheartening events that I have ever known. Since I heard of it, my emotions have run the gamut from disbelief, to puzzlement, to rage, to tears.

Dick's achievements in sports information have been lauded long and loud over the past few months. It is really sad that formal recognition of his works as sports writer, official scorer, sports data bank, a Varsity M Club prime mover and its only recording secretary, and UMass booster extraordinary, has come under such dire circumstances.

I've had the pleasure of knowing "Bresh" since we were freshman roommates in 1956. Besides the usual things that make strong friendships, we had sports as a common interest. For me, sports was the heroics of a few stars, like Ted Williams and Bob Cousy; a few memorized batting averages; and a loyalty to the home town teams. But for Bresh, sports was, and is, his reason for being. Sports reporting is not so much Dick's livelihood as it is his way of life.

The Sporting News came to the dorm weekly and Bresh devoured it as he has done each week since he was 12 years old. If you wanted to know who was doing what in the majors or minors, what his stats were, and who shined his shoes--Bresh knew. In rehashing a game of any type, Bresh could recap the circumstances, sequence of events, and participants on any given play.

Bresh's sensational gift of observation and recall has become widely known--virtually legendary. Of the hundreds of times I've marvelled at his skill, there is one time I remember most. That was the time that Bresh ticked off without hesitation the names of the four winning pitchers in some obscure World Series of the 1920's, to a roomfull of unbelieving fraternity brothers who then chased Dick from the room as if exercising a warlock. Old "facts and figures" Bresciani could really do his thing.

Dick had a sports news program on WMUA for a couple of years. His fine editing of the wire service releases provided some good listening. Occasionally I would go with Dick to the station and I'd be the one with butterflies in the stomach when the "on-the-air" sign appeared. In his own sure, basic style, Dick would carry it off beautifully, scoff at the butterflies, and then head back to the dorm to hit the books or to write a sports article for a Boston newspaper. (about the only coverage we got then.)

To bring reality to his dean's list journalism major and to prepare himself further for what had to be--a career in sports writing--Bresh took a summer job on a local newspaper. He gave me a tour of the newspaper office and then we headed for--what else, a Milford Legion baseball game. "See that third baseman", Dick said. "I'm trying to get him to go to UMass. He's got great hands and a good bat. Tony Williams is going to play third base for UMass some day." (He did too.)

Dick has always related well to athletes. He knows them not only as statistics, but as people. Ask these athletes; they know him. Or read some of Dick's articles which have appeared in the Alumnus over the years. Two of my favorites especially reflect Bresh's basic knowledge of the man behind the athlete--"The Big Guy" (Pete Guyeska) and "Blood On His Knees" (Joe DiSarcina). And there are other articles, news releases, publicity brochures, and the like which give not only the bricks and mortar but also the heart and soul of the athletic program at the University of Massachusetts.

You know, the years 1956-1960 were not exactly the "big" years in the history of UMass sports. But you wouldn't have known it by Dick's attitude. Whatever the final score, the record books were kept in top shape, the games' standouts extolled in Bresh's sport editorials in the Collegian, and most of all his hope for the future yearned for. The "future" seemed to begin with the 1960-1961 football season. The team had a winning record and a sweet victory over Harvard. It was the high point in our five years of watching UMass athletics. It seemed to forecast a fine beginning for Dick in his new job.

For the previous two years, Dick had been working part time in the Office of Sports Information as a much needed assistant to Richard Page. Now in 1960 Dick had his opportunity to channel his skills and aptitudes into what he liked to do best. And for 12 years he has done what he likes best better than most will ever know how. Bresh and I have maintained contact over the years. It has always been a pleasure to be witness to the pure joy in his voice or pen as he raved about the development of the UMass athletic program--the great coaches, the superb talent of the players, the super teams, the spirit of the fans--.

And so, I cried when I heard of Dick's ludicrous firing. You see, I know the man. He will remain the most perfectly matched person to his profession that I have ever known.

Post Script: These reflections may help to describe just how complete a professional is Dick Bresciani. But there are practical matters which these comments cannot resolve. The now-retired Director of Athletics was allowed to save face by not rehiring Dick. The Director's action is pitiful and inexcusable in itself. But perpetuation of an error was bad as his borders on administrative malpractice by the University of Massachusetts.

Women Gymnasts Remain Unbeaten

By STEVE CARY

For the first appearance in the Cage of the women varsity gymnasts, the snow on Saturday did no good. Clarion College was snowbound in Pennsylvania, reducing the scheduled tri-meet to a dual, and the men's meet was postponed until 6 p.m., dividing the anticipated audience an hour before activities were to begin. Add to this the long weekend with its vacant campus, and the gymnasts felt lucky to see the Cage only sparsely populated for their most exciting win of the season.

The Vaudreuil Silhouettes of Canada have been the only guests of the University this year on a comparable level of gymnastics with the UMass women. They have annually brought a team of tiny people here since 1969, led by Lise Aresenault and Daniele Bergeron, the only original Silhouettes remaining. Their spirit and mature conduct on as well as off the floor of competition make them a pleasure to watch, and although they lost this meet by 1.15 points, the gracious attitudes set an example of sportsmanship few teams follow.

Excepting a team disaster on the Balance Beam, UMass performed confidently, scoring approximately one point above the Silhouettes on the remaining three events. The beam was reportedly "unsteady" on the floating basketball floor, and at one point or another each UMass girl lost it and fell, but the Canadians were like glue while treating the four inches of wood beneath them as a plank. They led by a tenth going to the final event, Uneven Bars. Here the stronger women from UMass corrected nicely, however, and brought the meet in the end to 93.80 for themselves with 92.65 totalled by the Silhouettes.

Lise Aresenault won the All Around with a 34.00, and Margie Combs was second at 33.25, with Daniele Bergeron third scoring 29.50. Placings on the individual events were on Floor Exercise, Lise Aresenault first-8.45, Anne Vexler second-8.15, and Margie Combs third-7.9; on Side Horse Vaulting Lise Aresenault- 8.8, Combs-8.7, and Marina Rodriguez-7.9; on Balance Beam Aresenault-8.5, Anne Burroughs-7.85, and Combs- 7.8; and finally on the Unevens Margie Combs-8.85, Betsy East-8.55, and once more Aresenault-8.25.

These scores speak for themselves relative to the competition that evening, but in comparison to last week's team total of 102, it is good to understand that these ratings were more severe. Although each routine is ideally analyzed by four judges according to a perfect ten points, discrepancies in routine scores can be noted over a period of weeks due to the imperfect objectivity of the judges.

This objectivity is affected by a variety of circumstances, such as a judge learning the routines and becoming more meticulous in grading them, a judge being impressed by what he or she sees in warmups, a previous performance, good or bad, being recalled, or an enthusiastic crowd making its presence felt, with all of this determining to an important extent the consistency of the scoring. This consistency in the evaluations of routines in turn lends the outcome of the meet its validity.

Tonight in the Springfield College Fieldhouse at 7 p.m. this all becomes relevant. The UMass women are the guests there of the present Intercollegiate National Gymnastic Champions.

GRACEFUL MARINA RODRIGUEZ of the UMass Women's gymnastics teams shows the perfect form that has made her one of UMass' best on the balance beam. Tonight Marina and her teammates will be at Springfield to challenge the defending National Champions.

Matmen Pinned; Trackmen Impress

By JACKIE BOCK

The snow UMass experienced over the weekend brought many surprises for many people, such as late busses, spoiled weekend plans, dormitory depression, etc. But the biggest surprise it brought the sports scene was the manner in which the number one team in New England, UMass, went to wrestle the number twenty ranked team in the nation, the U.S. Military Academy.

The wrestling bill was to be New Hampshire on Saturday afternoon at Durham, but weather conditions forced a cancellation in those plans. Coach Barr, not wishing to waste the preparation the team had put into the match, saw his chance to get together with West Point for a dual match that would really test the team's metal!

The Cadets happened to be in the area for a match with the Springfield Chiefs and it was no real problem to run down to Springfield for the match. The Cadets polished off SC 20-12 and were ready for the Redmen at 3:30. Their lineup consisted of those wrestlers that had put them in national acclaim and had gotten them the number five ranking in the East.

The West Pointers, like their Navy and Air Force counterparts, are a physically strong, well-conditioned team that displays an aggressive attitude from the start of the match. So it was to this that the Redmen had to shift their gears from easy victory to extremely hard match.

The Cadets caught UMass at a good time because the boys have been working extra hard in preparation for the New Englands and were in good shape for the bouts which lasted six instead of the normal eight minutes.

At 118 West Point had Jerry Hamilton, an able veteran that was filling in for Larry Baltezore, sixth in the nation in 1971. UMass had Barry Godowsky, recently down from 126 pounds and ready to grapple. Hamilton had beaten Bob Meyer of SC earlier in the afternoon and expected an easy match with Barry, but suddenly found himself fighting for a draw. Neither man could take the other down or ride the other out, but both escaped and thus tied 1-1.

Mike McGlaughlin met Jim McArdle of West Point in the 126 pound bout and saw why McArdle had beaten previously undefeated Buddy Fenton of SC, as he lost 4-1. At the whistle, McArdle came jumping off the mark, but Mike kept his calm and stayed on the defensive long enough to set up an arm drag. He missed the drag by a narrow margin but in the process cooled McArdle off. It was only temporary, though, as the Cadet escaped and took Mike down in the third period and then saw Mike escape but remain behind as McArdle had riding time and one point more.

The 134 lb. match sent freshman Dick Muri against West Point's NCAA placer Bill James. James dominated the match with two takedowns, an escape, and riding times. Dick spent a lot of time keeping James from pressing his advantage, but came through with a fine effort against a very experienced wrestler. The final score was 6-1.

Clay Jester started off his bout by taking down Army's Ed Hetrick but made the mistake of not bringing him to the mat quick enough in the second period and was reversed and ended up on the short side 8-2.

Captain Shelly Goldberg was out of the lineup, still feeling the effects of a cold, but was ably replaced by Peter Rock. Peter wrestled Bill Webb of Army and was very aggressive but lost the takedown on a mistake in movement. He reversed Webb at the end of the first period and received a point for having his uniform pulled, but fell behind by virtue of a reversal, predicament and riding time.

The 158 pound match was the bright spot in the afternoon as Chris "Konan" Cadwallader bested Craig Nell 3-1. Chris has established a reputation in New England with his dexterity at a crab ride (which involves immobilizing the opponent's hands and legs with your hands and legs in an extended position) and he used it to good advantage as he rode his man for the point after reversing him in the second period. With Konan's victory the score stood 14-5, Army.

Mike Duffy was robbed in his match with Nage Damas. Duffy took Damas down and put him on his back and should have received four points, but the referee only signaled two and that made all the difference as Duffy lost 4-2, instead of a tie or win.

Bruce Buckbee ran into the meet of the lineup as he came on for the 177 pound bout against Ray Ritacco, a three year veteran and one of the top men in his weight class in the East. Bruce worked hard but was out-maneuvered a few times on the way to a 9-3 defeat. It should be noted that at the end of six, Ritacco was breathing hard while Bruce was only mildly winded.

Dale Morgan of West Point dropped from heavyweight to 190 this season and is also one of the men to beat in the East, plus being Army's best upper weight class man. Good as Morgan is, he was still amazed at the perpetual motion machine UMass calls John Connolly. John found Morgan strong and determined, but never quit moving, as he lost 11-3. In the locker room after the match, Morgan exclaimed, "I'd sure like to get ahold of the vitamins they feed that kid!"

For Carl Dambman it was an off the beam day as he wrestled Mike Alden to a 0-0 draw in the heavyweight bout. Carl was close to getting takedowns, but he was at the same time close to the edge of the mat and out of bounds. He came very close to picking up a reversal at the end of the second period and came close to being reversed at the end of the third.

In Coach Barr's words, "A 25-7 loss to West Point is better than a shut-out against New Hampshire. When our boys wrestle stiff competition like the academy their performance improves 50%, in some cases, the next day."

When queried as to how often he would like to see UMass wrestle teams like Army, Barr's reply was, "At least once a week."

The team also felt that it was beneficial to wrestle the Cadets and were of the same opinion voiced by Barry Godowsky, "I think it really helped me for the New Englands and we should do it again."

By EARLE BARROLL

While the UConn athletic department is dead set against need, the track program may deviate from the norm and ask for need basis...that's need for a win over UMass in Yankee Conference championships. On Saturday at Maine the UMass tracksters derailed UConn for the third straight time in championship competition dating back to last spring's and this past fall's track and cross country titles.

UConn coach Bob Kennedy was snowed in at Storrs and was not able to make the long haul to Orono. The night before he was the head official at a high school meet and expected to make the trek on Saturday morning. It must have been quite a shock to him when he picked up the phone after the meet was over and his assistant coach told him UMass had put it to them again.

For UMass coach Ken O'Brien this had to be a satisfying moment for him, reminiscent of the cross country season when he took a likewise young and inexperienced team all the way to the conference title.

O'Brien has pointed to the total putting together of all the good parts of this past dual meet season as the key to victory. "During the season some events were strong in some meets and other events were strong in other meets and we were very happy that we were able to put all the performances together for this one meet," he said.

As a team the tracksters had probably the best overall times for every event in the history of UMass track and it's very encouraging when you figure that the majority of these performers will be around for at least another two years.

It was perhaps the performance of co-captain Al Mangan that exemplified the total effort on Saturday. During the course of the regular season Al had not scored a point as the captain. He felt pretty bad about it, but his performance on Saturday redeemed his previous efforts.

He recalled, "I was in the unseeded heat of the 1000 and as the gun went off, I could hear coach O'Brien's voice over the rest of the crowd yelling 'you owe me this one' and this really set me going to the entire race."

He finished second overall in the 1000 yard run in the Conference.

Former UMass cross country ace Ron Wayne, who is now a track aide for O'Brien, finished second in the 20 mile Silver Lake Dodge marathon on Sunday. The one-time New England collegiate cross country champion has been on the comeback trail since late fall when he completed a six month stint in the reserves.

His time of 1:51.15 was some three minutes behind the winner Terry Gallagher, a former University of Kentucky runner and left Wayne with a lot of enthusiasm for the up and coming Boston Marathon on April 17.

Ron has been training 100 miles a week and his time for this Sunday's race was equivalent to a 2:23 marathon which would easily qualify him for the Olympic trials in Oregon during the summer.

Wayne and Gallagher pulled away from the pack early and led through 13 miles before Gallagher began pulling away through the snow and slushy roads leading from Hopkinton to Newton. At the 15 mile check point Wayne Frongello from Boston State, a noted distance runner passed Wayne, but three miles later found himself on the receiving end of Wayne's finishing kick which nailed him second place.

According to basketball coach Jack Leaman, if his team wins its remaining five games then a third straight berth in the N.I.T. is not out of the question. Their record will be 18-8.

Saturday's shocker over Rhode Island was indeed a big, big win as the Rams were coming off a big victory themselves over Providence. Remaining for the Redmen are four games on the road and one at home with Maine this Saturday.

Leaman and his team will step into zoos at UNH, URI, Maine and Fordham before the season ends. Right now UMass is back in front in the conference as a result of Saturday's trouncing, but Rhodey and Maine are right on their heels with two losses.

Saturday night's game with Maine will be senior night for Mike Pagliara, John Betancourt, Rich Vogeley and Chris Coffin. These four were along with Julius Erving the first pioneers in the UMass basketball surge to a place of prominence in the east.

Pucksters Must Win On Road At Boston State

By BILL BALLOU

Probably the favorite recreational activity for the group of budding hockey stars that now find themselves around five years of age is not hockey but sliding. In fact, with the nice, new snowfall, a lot of people have begun sliding again.

In spite of the renewed interest in the winter sport of sliding, there are at least 20 or so people involved in the UMass hockey program doing their own "sliding" and not liking it in the least.

The Redmen, who were the scourge of the Division up until a week ago, ran into some tough luck against UNH last Wednesday and since then have gone straight downhill. They beat Colby 7-1, despite playing rather poorly, and then dropped consecutive games to Bowdoin and St. Anselm's.

So UMass now stands at 14-3 in Division II, a good record but still behind Buffalo with just one defeat and Vermont with only two.

All this brings us to tonight and Boston State. State, if you remember, came into Orr Rink earlier this season and scored three goals in the first three minutes before finally bowing to UMass by 8-3. Their home games, however, are played at the Boston Arena and its egg-shaped ice surface. Playing at the Arena, according to Coach Jack Canniff, "Is a big disadvantage."

But, since the Redmen could only take two out of four on their recent homestand, they have put themselves into the position of being forced to win on the road.

The current skid has come at a less than opportune time, as the playoffs draw close. Canniff is not particularly happy with the current tenor of things, but doesn't plan any wholesale changes.

"We're down right now, no question about it. But jeez, at this point you've got to stick with what you've got and ride this thing out."

If the Redmen do "ride it out" against Boston State, they're going to have to do it without the services of goalie P.J. Flaherty who is out indefinitely with a sprained ankle. Either John Kiah or Chick Rheault will start in his place. Also on the doubtful list is Dennis Grabowski, who spent yesterday in the infirmary undergoing tests to determine what was wrong with his stomach.

The main problem the redmen seem afflicted with is lack of scoring, brought on by poor shooting. Canniff realizes this and points it out.

"Just look. Our leading scorer (Pat Keenan) hasn't had a goal in four games and just look at these stat sheets. Every game we're taking a load of shots, but we just can't put them on goal. We're only putting half, sometimes less than half, on the net."

Canniff is not an emotional man, but he can't help but feel the pressure of this little slump.

"I hope we break it soon," he said, "because it'll be a lot easier on my stomach."

Yours and Dennis Grabowski's, Coach.

VOLUME XCIX, ISSUE 95 UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1972

All hell broke loose, 25 minutes after the opening of the Trustee meeting when members and supporters of Veterans Against the War disrupted the proceedings of the meeting. The veterans demanded the Trustees to reconsider a motion from their last meeting which voided a ban against military recruitment on the Boston campus. The demonstrators also protested the fact that the meeting was considered to be a public meeting, yet approximately 30 people were forced to remain outside of the meeting room. Budget Cut, Trustees Confronted

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

Boston-UMass President Robert Wood at the monthly meeting of the Trustees formally announced here yesterday that the University has been requested to take "sharp reductions from our budget requests in dollars and in teaching positions."

Wood's announcement was not the only happening of the afternoon as the proceedings suffered the second major interruption in as many meetings. Twenty-five minutes after the opening of the meeting, approximately 30 members and supporters of Veterans Against the War (VAW) disrupted the meeting. At the last meeting the supporters of Freda Salzman staged a demonstration during the meeting in order to express their views to the Trustees.

The VAW, joined by the UMass-Boston-Dorchester Alliance demanded that the trustees address themselves to the immediate issues at hand such as the recruiting policies on the Boston campus, the Freda Salzman case and the UMass-Boston-Dorchester issue.

Chairman Joseph Healey ruled that the protestors were out of order and directed Trustee George Pumphret to continue with his particular business and to ignore the loud, steady chants of the demonstrators.

The Trustee's quickly finished their business and prepared to deal with the demonstrators. At this point the main issue at hand according to the demonstrators was that the meeting was a public meeting, yet more than 30 people were forced to remain outside, and approximately a dozen police officers were present outside of the meeting room.

The Security Director of the building ruled at this point that the room was filled to capacity and under no circumstances would he allow more people in to the room or allow the door to be opened in order to accomodate the people outside of the meeting room.

Wood in a press briefing immediately following the meeting said the real problem in the budget cut is that it involves a "reduction in money and a freeze on faculty positions as enrollments go up."

The trustees last August in their budget presentation to the Governor requested $89 million, but this figure has now been cut to 72.5 million. The trustees normally expect a 10% cutback when they do make a budget presentation such as the $80 million requested last year and the $65 million actually received.

The problem is that the $16.5 million cutback this year represents a 20% loss. Wood termed this doubled reduction as representing a "crisis" to the University.

On the effect of the budget cutback in relation to the average UMass student, Wood said: "With a growing enrollment next fall, the figure of $1,550,000 (the executive's recommended appropriation this year for financial aid and for aid to disadvantaged students) means aid per student will drop 7%--while costs increase and needs grow."

As far as the freeze on faculty positions is concerned, Wood stated, "We will work for the restoration of faculty positions that will permit us to fulfill our obligation to our students and to maintain the good name of the University."

The three-year-old Salzman case appears to be entering a new dimension. The Trustees latest means of handling the case is to eventually send the issue to their own sub-committee-the Committee of Faculty and Education Policy.

The Trustees within the week will determine the exact issue which will be heard before the committee. At this point they will also make arrangements for an open hearing in front of the committee for Ms. Salzman.

Mr. George Salzman demanded that the Trustees give him access to files which contain allegations against Ms. Salzman. These allegations were cited by Chancellor Broderick of Boston when he rejected the Tenure and Grievance Committee's recommendation to reappoint Ms. Salzman.

"For over a year now, the Trustees and the President have ignored my repeated requests for access to secret allegations against me, allegations which I am certain are slanderous and which I obviously must have an opportunity to rebut. By preventing my appeal, the Trustees demonstrated that

Veeck-Baseball Needs A Change, As Do We

By MARK VOGLER

Sporting world personality Bill Veeck entertained a crowd of about 200 last night in the Student Union Ballroom by unloading a barrage of baseball anecdotes before making a joint proposal to revolutionize the national past time sport and the American way of life in general.

"Baseball has fallen into evil ways of late," remarked Veeck. It has fallen from the professional national game to a sorry second. And the grateful way of saying this is that it has actually become dull.

"Part of the fault has been the refusal of the baseball organization to recognize the need for change in the society. It was a game that was beautifully adapted to the 90's and 20's, but football, basketball, and hockey have become more dominant now, Veeck continued.

Sportsman Bill Veeck entertained a crowd of 200 last night with his talk on the game of baseball and the American way of life. (MDC photo by Carl Nash)

"It's rather a shame too, because baseball is the only game left open to a man of average size. Basketball requires a fellow to be seven feet tall and football requires a man of the same width. The difference is that these sports are in a continuous state of change, change that has been calculated to make the game more interesting from the fan's standpoint.

"Now I'm not saying that baseball hasn't made some changes too. Well, I can't think of 'em off hand--oh yes. The giant strides in the future...they've taken the collars off the uniform, you can't throw a glove on the field anymore, and you're not allowed to wear white kangaroo shoes."

Some of the changes that Veeck pointed out for the betterment of baseball included installing a permanent offensive unit, using a steady pinch hitter, and designating a special man to pinch run ("It's ridiculous. They ought to get someone like Jesse Owens who can run. It's better than watching some guy waddle from 1st to 2nd.")

After elaborating on baseball and its needed changes for a spell, Veeck directed his attention to the establishment and the way it discourages change of any kind.

"I didn't mean to harangue you with baseball," the speaker told his audience. "I've come here to recommend change in the homogenized, computerized, and mechanized world which traps us all. I'm here to open cells to oppose bigness, numbers, and machines in insidious ways.

"Did it ever occur to you what you could do to an IBM card with a pin? We have a right to be people, to be human, not to become numbers. If you don't fight this right, then you'll become syphers."

Besides his message to those on hand, Veeck kept everybody in the crowd in stitches with his hesitant, but hilarious tales of baseball lore and his clever insertions of puns throughout the evening. He spun a dandy yarn about Early Wynn, the former Chicago White Sox hurler who won over 300 games in his career.

"Early Wynn was the only man to throw his curve ball high and get away with it," recalled Veeck. "He wasn't the meanest pitcher, but he certainly was one of the most miserable out there.

"I remember the day when he was pitching to his son, and the boy knocked the ball right over the fence. The ball went further over the fence on the next pitch. Then the boy hit the dirt and his helmet went flying off as daddy tried to skull 'em. I called out to him: 'What are you doing that for, that's your kid!' He snapped back: 'What difference does it make, the bumb had a bat in his hand, didn't he?!"

"The point that I'm trying to make," said Veeck, "is that Early contested everything. You students out there should contest more often. Change is the most important thing thatyou can create. The best way is not always the way that it has been done before. One thing more that I better add is be a little late than Early."

Veeck opened up his ad-libing talk on the rightnote by comically lamenting over the small turnout.

Speaking in behalf of his old beloved St. Louis Browns, one-time patsies of the American League, Veeck put it this way: "Well, I actually didn't expect a crowd this large tonight. For crowds this large we'd had played a double-header.

"You know, the St. Louis Browns were really ingenious. We never lost a ball game the same way. We used to celebrate a winning streak of one straight.

"One thing we had was character, though. I don't think that you can develop character and win. Winning isn't the most important thing--it's the only thing. Not everything about the Browns was bad, unless you watched everyday. And no one did."

One of the questions that made the night was in regard to how Veeck would handle the Boston Red Sox if they were his own. He was ready for this one. The speaker chuckled a bit and then gave the response short and sweet: "How much time do you have? May I start with Tom Yawkey and work right down from there? If you think that I feel that the recent trades will help the Red Sox get closer to the Orioles, no, I don't. But it's certainly a nice change of faces."

A question and answer period followed the talk, along with a coffee hour in the Colonial Lounge.

SOS Starts Funds Drive

Students will be given a direct opportunity today to rectify the horrifying and inhumane conditions which now exist at the Belchertown State School for the retarded.

Students Offering Support (SOS) will man a table in the Campus Center concourse level between 9:00 a.m. and 4:30 p.m. in order to solicit support and funds from students who are interested in supporting the class suit filed by 28 parents in U.S. District Court which would alleviate many of the inhumane conditions and unjust policies at Belchertown.

Trustees Discuss Budget Reductions

they were not seriously dedicated to their own supposed principle that all personnal reviews should be "full, fair, informed, and impartial." said Ms. Salzman.

The veterans were en masse at the meeting since the Trustees in their January meeting and voiced a ban on military recruiting on the Boston campus.

John Hopkins, a representative of VAW and a UMass student, addressed the Trustees and called for the trustees "to lead the fight against the war."

"We oppose military recruitment on campus," said Hopkins who asked the trustees to take an immediate vote on their position concerning recruitment on campus. The Trustees decided to reconsider the recruitment vote at their next meeting.

Mike Levi, a representative of the UMass-Boston-Dorchester Alliance and a UMass student, said that student influx in the Dorchester area because of the opening of the UMass-Boston complex at Columbia Point without sufficient student housing, would cause a high rate of eviction notices and a rise in rents to residents who come from the lower income bracket.

Levi asked the Trustees to delay the opening of the Boston project until a comprehensive plan for student housing could be formulated in the Dorchester area.

A Better Way To Spend Your Date?

By CAROL CHRISTIANSEN

"Go petitioning with your date," was the proposition made at a WMPIRG (Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group) meeting attended by about twenty students last night at seven o'clock in the Campus Center.

The purpose of the meeting was to organize volunteers to collect the 2000 signatures still needed to put the bill for student funding of WMPIRG before the Board of Trustees. Carl Sapolin and Alan Yelsey of WMPIRG expressed optimism that this goal would be reached within two weeks, but volunteers willing to make a commitment to petition are needed.

The reasons for employing a semi-coercive method to collect WMPIRG money were also explained at the meeting. It would cost twenty cents per student to put an optional check box on the fall semester bill' if money were collected next year by donations the process would be long and tedious; incoming freshmen will not be familiar with WMPIRG. Those students not willing to donate the two dollars may collect their refund beginning the third week of the semester.

Several alternatives for making refund collection easier for students are being considered. Students may be able to receive their money fron their heads of residence, or from a central office in each dorm complex.

Following the meeting, which lasted half an hour, volunteers were organized into groups to petition in Southwest.

Ken Kesey To Speak At A.-C. Tonight

"A Spit in the Ocean" will be the topic of a lecture by novelist Ken Kesey at Amherst College on Thursday, Feb. 24.

Sponsored by Amherst FORUM, the student lecture committee, the event will take place at 8 p.m. in Johnson Chapel. It is open to the public without charge.

Kesey's writing career began in 1962 with the publication of "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," described by one critic as "an honest, claustrophobic, stylistically brilliant first novel which makes us shiver as we laugh.... paradoxically, it keeps us 'in balance' by revealing our madness."

Utilizing his own style, Kesey describes it as a "style of change. ...I do not want to write like anybody else. I do not want to be part of the Movement. I want to keep moving."

Following the talk in Johnson Chapel, there will be a reception and dance for Mr. Kesey in the Alumni Gymnasium, featuring the music of the Holy Modal Rounders, the nationally known country rock group, and the Buffalo Chips.

Mobe Funding Refused Again

By MARY SMITH

A motion to rescind an earlier decision not to fund the University Mobilization Committee was defeated at last night's Student Senate meeting. The 42-25-3 vote was recorded after a heated discussion, which included the presentation of a slide show depicting the continuing role of American involvement in Indo-China.

Also at last night's meeting, the Senate, in a Special Business Motion, condemned the Board of Trustees for their handling of recent issues relating to the Boston Campus. The bill, presented by Vice-President Larry Ladd and co-sponsored by Senator Nick Apostola, instructs Senate President Lee Sandwen to submit specific motions to the Board regarding the Freida Salzman case, the expansion of the Boston Campus into the Dorchester area, and the Trustees' vote to overrule a student decision to ban military recruiters from the Boston Campus.

The debate concerning the funding of MOBE followed the slide show produced by the American Friends Service Committee. The show, presented as debate infavor of MOBE, deals with U.S. complicity in the air war in South East Asia. Because of a ten-minute limit imposed by the Senate, the slide show was reduced to less than half of its usual length.

Vice-President Larry Ladd opened discussion in favor of MOBE by citing MOBE's continued activism in the anti-war movement. Ladd argued that the question of funding MOBE was one that gave the Senate an ethical perspective of what a student government is and what interests it should represent.

Following Ladd, MOBE Co-chairperson Chuck Kenyon reminded the Senate of the vital service MOBE has performed in educating the University community. Citing the various Teach-Ins and organizational work in conjunction with the National Peace Action Coalition, along with the work done in surrounding areas, Kenyon refuted charges that the MOBE was not functioning in an effective manner. Also voicing support for funding were Senators Whalen and Stevens, who deplored the immorality of the killing in SE Asia.

Opposition to the motion was led by Senator Robert Waters. Waters claimed that the tactics used by the MOBE were simply propaganda, showing little intelligence, and similar to those used by Joe McCarthy in his Communist allegations.

Also opposed to the motion were Senators Tackeff and Casper. Tackeff questioned the validity of the slide show, proposing that the wounded children pictured in the slide could have been wounded by North Vietnamese forces. Senator Casper opposed the motion on the grounds that he agreed with the aims of MOBE, but not with the tactics they employ.

Tom Moriarty, former co-chairperson of MOBE, was allowed to defend the organization. Arguing that organized opposition to the war is necessary and that simply wanting the war to end would accomplish nothing, Moriarty reminded the Senate that the SMC is the only effective peace group on campus. He refuted the charge that the MOBE is not interacting with the community by citing the extensive leafletting done in Amherst, Hadley, Greenfield and Northampton.

Senator Bill Staton summed up the opposition to the MOBE. Claiming that a difference exists between agreeing with MOBE and agreeing to fund the Committee, Staton stated that he did not feel that the funding of MOBE coincided with the interests of the majority of the student body. The question was called and defeated, yet the negative vote does not preclude the possibility of MOBE resubmitting an additional motion for funds.

The Special Business motion concerning the Board of Trustees resulted from yesterday's heavily policed Trustee meeting. Reporting on the meeting, Vice-President Ladd stated that the meeting was deliberately held in a room which allowed only a limited number of spectators. The motion instructs President Sandwen to submit three motions to the Trustees. The first would require the Board to hold open hearings on the Freida Salzman case. The second bill urges reconsideration of a recent Trustee ruling that overturned a decision by the Boston Student Senate to ban military recruiters from the Campus. The final motion instructs the Trustees to hold additional public hearings concerning UMass expansion in Dorchester.

In other business the Senate defeated a motion to fund the Fencing Club. The Senate also passed a motion to support SOS, a state-wide organization formed to support the Belchertown State School class suit.

Panelists Disagree On Children Marxism

By ETHEL HARRIS

"Chile's Marxist Experiment: What Does It Mean For the Americas?", the fourth in the 1972 Great Decision series, was the topic of last night's panel discussion in Webster Lounge. Discussion centered around the effects of the recently elected Marxist government of Salvador Allende upon the United States and other Latin American nations.

Moderator of the panel was Luther Allen of the UMass political science department. Panelists included Michael Best, UMass economics department; Harvey Kline, UMass political science department; Arthur Gillette of the UMass School of International Education; and Eliance Ortegon, a graduate student of Mt. Holyoke College.

Professor Kline stated that he favored the Allende government, but was doubtful that it would succeed. He explained that the Socialists have previously been in power as the Popular Front during the 1930's. Previous parties, according to Kline, supported the status quo; yet the Communists and Socialists neither favor subversion, nor advocate change through violence.

Kline also cited problems which the Allende government would face. Chief among those were a coalition government and no clear majority in Congress, a very high inflation rate (35% in the past year), nationalization of the copper mines, and a concentration of domestic capital in the hands of a few.

According to Michael Best, the reason for the change in government was largely economic. He explained how "capitalism inhibits underdeveloped countries"; because an underdeveloped nation depends on trade with other nations, it must also be politically subordinate to them. Increasing inequalities within underdeveloped nations cannot be solved without a redistribution of wealth or an increase in wages, Best claimed, but neither is happening in the capitalistic countries.

Ms. Ortegon commented on the reactions of the students at Catholic University in Santiago, where she had been teaching, to the Allende government. She stated that many university students opposed the present regime.

One of the reasons for students' lack of enthusiasm for the Allende government, according to Ms. Ortegon, was their annoyance over the attempt of the government to control the university TV channels, the only one not pro-Allende. This point was disputed by Arthur Gillette. He claimed that only one station was shut down, not to stop opposition, but because the station was in violation of anti-sedition laws, and the previous goverment had refused to renew its license.

Gillette also cited problem areas with which Allende will have to deal, chiefly with problems of health and education. He also stressed the importance of unity within the Allende coalition of Communists and Socialists.

Questions from the audience related to the nature of the Allende coalition, the policy and programs of the Christian Democrat Party, and the possibility of combining democracy and socialism in one nation.

Amherst Elections Follow Trend

(Editor's Note: We will try to get part two of this article, a discussion of the student vote on the elections in tomorrow's Collegian.)

By CHARLEY BERKOW

Voters in Amherst clearly opted for change in Tuesday's town elections, the first since the voting age was lowered to 18.

But the change in the non-partisan Board of Selectmen elections followed a trend started last year, and student effect on the election is debatable (literally).

In short, the young (relatively; this means 30-40 as opposed to 50-70), progressive candidates for selectmen won this year.

Bob Garvey, a winner and the second highest vote-getter in the town-wide four man selectman race, had campaigned on a platform of change for the town government structure.

Frank Decker, a retired personnel consultant, campaigned on a platform of non-change in the town government structure, and finished last.

Leo Bouchard, a Master Electrician, and former Democratic Town Committee chairman, finished first in the balloting. He was endorsed by Student Senate President Lee Sandwen, and was considered a liberal.

Stephen Keedy, an insurance agent, mentioned by a high town official as having a more conservative image, came in third in the balloting; he lost. He is a veteran of six years as a Selectman, and was the only incumbent running.

H. Hills Skillings, the other Selectman who was up for re-election this year, and also the bearer of a conservative image, has retired.

"Two years ago," said a town official, "the Board was all older, more conservative Republicans." Last year, Norman McCloud, the Chairman of the Board, lost in a race with Nancy Eddy and Michael Sullivan, Jr., both younger, and considered to be more liberal and Democratic. The other incumbent, also older, had retired.

But the new members were still outnumbered on the board, 3 to 2. Now, the balance of progressives to conservatives has shifted to 1 to 4.

All the votes I have witnessed in about 10 Board of Selectmen meetings have been unanimous. It's fine that 5 people can agree so often on so many things. It seems, though, that the Selectmen are persuaded in the meeting to vote with the majority, or that the bickering goes on behind closed doors. One indication of this is suggested in a recent rules change passed by the Selectmen. The change, proposed by Nancy Eddy, restricts the matters that can be discussed in executive session--behind closed doors.

Selectman Michael Sullivan, Jr., elected last year, thinks that the changes in the Selectmen come from basic changes in the community. He noted that registered Democrats now outnumber registered Republicans in Amherst. Just a few years ago, he said,, the Republicans outnumbered the Democrats two-to-one.

Sullivan thinks that the party shift is part of a shift in the constituency to younger more liberal people.

Selectman-Elect Leo Bouchard agrees. He told the MDC yesterday that he thought that "the change in the composition of the Board of Selectmen reflects a change in the character of the town."

The Town Manager, Allen Torrey, was appointed by the Selectmen in 1954, when the Board was still composed of a majority of Republicans. However, his position is probably not in jeopardy, even with the shift of the composition of the Board to the younger, more progressive Selectmen. Nobody has spoken of replacing Torrey; most Selectmen appear satisfied with his work.

Given the recent trends though one has to wonder if Merle Howes will be able to retain his position as Chairman of the Board of Selectmen. He is up for re-election for his third three-year term next year.

A veteran of five years, he is the most senior of the Selectmen. He tends to be associated with the more traditional Selectmen in Amherst, and they have not been doing too well lately, judging from Tuesday's election.

China Talks Hint Improved Relations

PEKING (AP)-President Nixon and Premier Chou En-lai held another long session Wednesday, and more friendly Chinese overtures lent hope that the leaders are charting ways for improving relations between their nations.

Before the opening of the second four-hour meeting in as many days, Chou indicated some American correspondents could stay on for a look at China after Nixon leaves next week.

After the meeting, Chou escorted the President and Mrs. Nixon to a sports show at Capital Stadium and about 18,000 waiting Chinese applauded as the presidential party entered. At the gymnasium, Nixon was seen by the largest live audience since he arrived Monday. This added to his public exposure, already underscored by the sellout of the People's Daily when it gave lavish display to the first accounts of his visit.

Another gesture regarded as friendly was the fact that the day's meeting between Nixon and Chou was held at the guest house where the Nixons are staying. The two previous sessions had been held in the Great Hall of the People.

Again the atmosphere was friendly. Nixon and Chou laughed and joked. Before the doors closed, Chou told the waiting reporters, "If the press wants to see any more places, they can apply to the Department of Information. You don't have much time here."

"How are you all?" Chou asked the American correspondents.

"They're better than they deserve," the President interjected.

Nixon asked Chou if the snowy weather would prevent the visitors from seeing the Great Wall outside Peking Thursday. The premier predicted that the weather would "turn fine."

No word of what is under discussion has come from behind the closed doors. But it seemed certain they were covering ideas for cultural and scientific exchanges, a Nixon goal, and perhaps had discussed Vietnam.

No one expects the Chinese to give on Nixon's peace plan for Indochina. Chou made clear before the President arrived in China that the plan was unacceptable.

Possibly reflecting Hanoi's certainty on this, George Wald, a Harvard antiwar professor, said in Hong Kong on his arrival Wednesday from North Vietnam: "I think the Chinese are going to hold the line on Vietnam." But Wald added that the North Vietnamese "have had the same feeling of uneasiness as the American peace movement in the past few months about which way China might go."

Nixon's plan calls for a complete U.S. troop withdrawal from Vietnam within six months of an agreement, and new elections in South Vietnam with President Nguyen Van Thieu resigning a month before the vote. In return North Vietnam would release all war prisoners.

The North Vietnamese so far have avoided any press or radio mention of Nixon's trip.

Behind the show of Chinese friendliness may be a desire to worry the Russians. The Soviet leaders are well aware that the remote Mao Tse-tung, in an almost unprecedented gesture, saw Nixon on his first day in Peking. They know that Chou has made an outward show of friendliness to Nixon after the rather low-key reception at the airport upon the President's arrival.

The Kremlin also is aware that People's Daily splashed a propaganda-free account of Nixon's Tuesday complete with pictures of the President with Mao and the premier.

In Brief...

Social Security Increase?

WASHINGTON (AP) — A 20 per cent Social Security benefit increase-instead of the 5 per cent provided by pending legislation-was started down the legislative ways Wednesday with a powerful shove from Rep. Wilbur D. Mills.

The Arkansas Democrat, chairman of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, introduced a bill that would make the increase effective June 1.

IRS Issues Candidate Guidelines

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service issued temporary guidelines Wednesday under the new Campaign Financing Act and disclosed candidates must file forms if contributions for their campaigns are to be eligible for a tax deduction or credit.

In addition, the IRS said, individual taxpayers must get a written receipt from a candidate or campaign committee to substantiate the tax deductions or credit to be allowed for the first time on 1972 returns.

Kennedy III Happy To Get Out

ATHENS (AP) Joseph P. Kennedy III, free from an ordeal of captivity aboard a hijacked jumbo jetliner, stopped here Wednesday on his way to Frankfurt. "It's great to be out," he said, and placed a five-minute telephone call to his mother in the United States.

Young Joe, eldest son of the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, and 117 other male passengers were freed from the hijacked Lufthansa jet Tuesday night.

Priest Busted For Speech

ASHLAND, Wis. (AP)-The Rev James E. Groppi, charged earlier in the day with disorderly conduct for an allegedly obscene remark during a speech Tuesday night, said Wednesday the accusation was "unbelievable."

"Sounds like I walked into a pretty conservative area," the civil rights priest said in Milwaukee, where he is an associate pastor at St. Michael's Catholic parish.

Dist. Atty. William Chase of Ashland County in the far northern tip of the state said the summons being forwarded to Milwaukee orders Groppi to appear before Ashland County Judge Walter H. Cate March 1 to answer the charge, which was brought by John Chapple, a newsman for the Ashland Daily Press.

Groppi indicated that he would comply, but would have to confer with his attorneys first.

U.S. Resumes Paris Peace Talks

PARIS (AP)-The Vietnam peace talks, suspended for a week by the United States, resume Thursday under the shadow of the U.S.-Chinese summit meeting in Peking.

Despite disclaimers by both U.S. and Chinese officials that the Vietnam war can be moved toward settlement in Peking, observers here assumed that the subject would come up in some form and the discussions between President Nixon and Premier Chou En-lai might have a major influence on the conflict.

Asked if they are concerned that the war might be settled behind their backs in Peking, one of their principal allies, North Vietnamese and Viet Cong delegates to the Paris talks point to official Chinese statements of support and assertions that Paris is the place to settle the war.

China has repeatedly voiced support for the Vietnamese Communist peace plans. They call for total U.S. withdrawal from South Vietnam by a fixed time limit, repatriation of prisoners and the ouster of President Nguyen Van Thieu of South Vietnam.

The United States and South Vietnam, in their peace plan, promise U.S. withdrawal within six months of an agreement, which also calls for new presidential elections with Thieu resigning a month before.

Thursday's 145th session of the talks normally would have been held Feb. 17. But U.S. Ambassador William J. Porter balked at holding a meeting then because of an international anti-war conference in nearby Versailles Feb. 11-13.

Porter called the Versailles gathering 'a horde of Communist-controlled agitators" and refused to attend a meeting of the peace talks in the atmosphere he said the conference created.

The Versailles World Assembly of Paris for Peace and Independence of the Indochinese Peoples backed the Communist peace plans.

V.C. Continue Attacks

SAIGON (AP)-Enemy troops hit military positions and villages in South Vietnam again Wednesday while in the central highlands rangers battled a North Vietnamese company in the Chu-Pa Mountains.

Most of the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong attacks were limited to small rocket and mortar assaults. The hit-and-run shelling tactic has been the pattern of the attacks since the enemy forces stepped up ground activity Saturday.

In another development, military sources in Pleiku said four Chinese-manufactured copies of the powerful Russian 160mm mortar have been located in different areas of the central highlands near Fire Base 5, northwest of Kontum.

The 3,000-pound mortar, which has a range of more than four miles was used against the French in Indochina in 1953. It is moved about on wheels.

Hartke Senate Seat Contested

WASHINGTON (AP)-The Supreme Court Wednesday cleared the way for a recount of Sen. Vance Hartke's narrow victory over former Rep. Richard L. Roudebush in 1970.

The 5-2 decision held a second counting of contested ballots in 11 Indiana counties would not usurp the Senate's authority to be the final judge of the qualifications of its members.

Justice Potter Stewart rested his majority opinion on the constitutional provision that the states prescribe the times, places and manner of holding elections. "A recount does not prevent the Senate from independently evaluating the election any more than the initial count does," he said.

Roudebush, now an official with the Veterans Administration, said the ruling was expected and it pleased him. "Not to allow a recount would be inconceivable to me because there would be no local method of investigating any election irregularities," he said.

Hartke, campaigning in New Hampshire for the Democratic presidential nomination, was expected to issue a statement later.

A Democrat, Hartke retained his seat over Republican Roudebush by a plurality of 4,383 votes out of more than 1,730,000cast-a margin of about one vote a precinct.

Two weeks later Roudebush asked for the recount in 464 precincts scattered through 11 counties including populous Marion County Indianapolis. However, a federal district court granted Hartke an injunction. He was seated by the Senate for a third term "without prejudice" to the outcome of Roudebush's appeal.

Stewart stressed that the Senate is free to reject Hartke or Roudebush, however the recount turns out, and conduct its own tally. But, he said, "a recount is an integral part of the Indiana electoral process and is within the gambit of the broad powers delegated to the states."

In a second ruling and by the same vote the court held tenants do not have a constitutional right to hold back their rent until landlords fix their dilapidated dwellings.

"We do not denigrate the importance of decent, safe and sanitary housing," said Justice White in rejecting a Portland couple's challenge of an Oregon eviction law. "But the Constitution does not provide judicial remedies for every social and economic ill."

The couple, Donald and Edna Lindsey, were ordered evicted from their house when they refused to pay their $100-a-month rent until the landlord made repairs. The house had been declared unfit for habitation by city officicials.

White said the Lindseys could have sued the landlord in a separate action, but there is nothing in the Constitution that guarantees tenants "access to dwellings of a particular quality or any recognition of the right of the tenant to occupy the real property of his landlord beyond the term of his lease without the payment of rent..."

Justice Douglas, in dissent, described the state law as feudal and said it is rooted in agrarian society.

"In the setting of modern urban life, the home, even though it be in the slums, is where man's roots are," Douglas wrote. "To put him into the street when the slum landlord, not the slum tenant, is the real culprit deprives the tenant of a fundamental right without any real opportunity to defend."

In a third ruling, a unanimous court protected workers who assist the National Labor Relations Board in investigating unfair labor charges against their boss.

The decision came in the case of four men who were fired by an electrical contractor in Springfield, Mo., after they gave statements to an NLRB examiner.

In a fourth ruling, the court admonished federal judges to rule promptly on appeals by servicemen for discharge as conscientious objectors once their claims have been rejected by military authorities.

Herald Travelers Threatened By WHDH License Loss

BOSTON (AP)-A lawyer for WHDH, Inc., said loss of WHDH-TV operation of Boston's Channel 5 would result in the loss of one of the city's newspapers, presumably the Herald Traveler.

WHDH, Inc., is a subsidiary of the Boston Hearld-Traveler Corp., which also publishes the daily morning newspaper, The Boston Herald Traveler.

The statement on the loss of the newspaper came from William J. Dempsey, attorney for WHDH, when he moved in the U.S. Court of Appeals Tuesday for a stay in a Federal Communications Commission order giving Boston Broadcaster, Inc., BBI authority to begin broadcasting on Channel 5 March 19.

Dempsey said that:

"The termination of WHDH-TV operations on March 10 will result in a loss of established TV service, with consequent injury to WHDH stockholders and will cause disruption between WHDH and many community organizations, advertisers and other parties with whom WHDH is presently dealing and has dealt with over the past 14 years and would result in the loss of one of Boston's two standard-sized newspapers."

Davis Gets Bail After 16 Months

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP)-A judge ruled Wednesday that Angela Davis could be freed immediately on bail after 16 months imprisonment on murder-kidnap charges, the prosecutor in her case said.

Assistant Atty. Gen. Albert Harris Jr. told newsmen after a closed-chambers hearing that Superior Court Judge Richard E. Arnason had set bail at $102,500.

The judge also ordered that Miss Davis' trial on murder, kidnap and conspiracy charges open here Monday as scheduled, Harris said.

Earlier, Miss Davis' chief attorney, Howard Moore Jr., left the hearing and told newsmen and about 100 supporters of the black revolutionary: "We got what we came for."

The group responded with a loud cheer and Moore departed, saying he was going to prepare necessary legal papers.

The defense won the hearing on bail on grounds that the California Supreme Court last week ruled the death penalty unconstitutional. Under state law, capital crimes such as murder have been nonbailable offenses.

Harris told newsmen that the prosecution agreed that Miss Davis would be eligible for bail if the high court decision stood.

In no case, Harris argued, should Miss Davis be freed before the decision became final in 30 days.

He said that the attorney general's office plans to ask the Supreme Court to rehear its decision filed last Friday.

Asked how Arnason responded to the prosecution argument, Harris said: "He feels no good purpose will be served by delay."

"I think what he is doing is contrary to law," Harris said, but he added that the state plans no appeal.

Miss Davis, 28, is charged in the Aug. 7, 1970, shooting that claimed four lives at the courthouse in San Rafael, north of San Francisco.

She is accused of furnishing four guns used in the shooting. The four victims were a judge, two convicts and a youth who helped the convicts in an escape attempt.

Harris said Arnason stipulated that Miss Davis could be freed on the posting of $2,500 cash and a $100,000 bond.

The National United Committee to Free Angela Davis had announced before the hearing it was prepared to post bail.

"We have Miss Davis' bail ready should it be set today. We also have a place for her to live. All arrangements are confidential," the committee said in a statement.

The committee said Miss Davis had decided to grant no news interviews for at least three weeks.

Harris said the judge stipulated that Miss Davis could not leave the San Francisco Bay Area while on bail. Specific boundaries were not immediately defined.

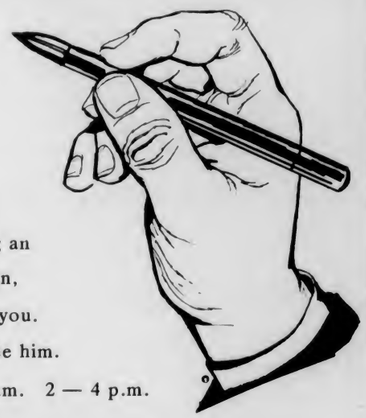
Prior to the state Supreme Court ruling, Harris had opposed several defense petitions seeking bail for Miss Davis.

He had argued that California law prohibits bail in capital cases where there is a strong presumption of guilt or evidence the defendant might flee.

Arnason denied bail on that basis last June 15. However, immediately after the state court announced its death penalty ruling, Arnason said it "certainly changed entirely the restrictions I felt were compelling when I ruled on the bail."

Miss Davis was arrested Oct. 13, 1970 in a New York City motel and was returned to California two months later.

China Trip Costs $300,000



WASHINGTON (AP)-President Nixon's trip to China is costing taxpayers at least $300,000 for transportation alone. Total costs could be several times that amount.

The White House says it hasn't calculated the trip's cost. Some estimates can be made, however, based on such known expenses as the hourly operating costs of the presidential jet.

But the cost of the taxpayers is dwarfed by the multimillion-dollar outlays being made by the television networks and other news organizations to provide coverage of the President's trip. Media expenses include, for example, 10 cents a word for dispatches transmitted from China.

Probably the biggest single government expense category is transportation.

Petition To Circulate On Improving Commons

By LAURA DUBOWSKI

At a one-hour meeting in the Campus Center Tuesday night, the Senate Food Services Committee decided to circulate a general petition about improving existing conditions of the food department.

Led by Chairwoman Donita White and Co-chairman Mike Pipp, the committee discussed plans to notify the student body about Food Services, arranged to post announcements in the dorms about the petition, and agreed to attend the bi-weekly food testing days.

It was ascertained that the petition would include requests for better food, cleanliness, and an overall improvement in the atmosphere of the Dining Commons. Five hundred petitions with space for 50 names on each will be printed up this week and distributed to the volunteer petitioners at the next weekly meeting. At this time, the decision will be made as to what day to petition and where to petition (at the Dining Commons or in the dorms).

At the meeting, attention was pointed at the lack of knowledge most students have about the Food Services. Special note was given to the fact that the Committee meetings are no longer held with members of the Administration (the heads of the Food Department), as they were in the past. Now Food Services is affiliated with the Student Senate and possesses power. It was also brought to light that many students remain unaware of the fact that the price of meal tickets is going up next semester.

The handful of committee members who attended the meeting approved of the idea to place announcements on the floors of all the dorms on campus. This would serve to inform the students of the Food Services' plan to circulate the petition and tell them of their tentative plan for a one-two-or three meals a day ticket.

Arrangements were made for committee members to attend the food-testing days held every Tuesday and Thursday. These tests, open to the public, are usually given from 2:30 to 3:30.

It was the general consensus at the end of the meetings that every effort should be made to increase membership and involvement in the Food Services.

Tuition Workshop Held

A conference of all State and Community Colleges dealing with the tuition issue at State Schools was held at UMass last weekend. The Conference, sponsored by the University and State Communications Council (USCC), was primarily a workshop to inform all schools of the present status of the tuition issue and to air student sentiment pertaining to this issue.

After lengthy discussions, the college representatives adoptd the stance that none of the proposed legislative tuition bills were acceptable or supportable at the present time because no study has shown what would be the actual effects of a new tuition policy on students and on the schools themselves.

The bills that the conferees discussed are ones that have been filed in the State Legislature calling for a rise in tuition at all state institutions of higher learning. There are two ways in which the tuition can be raised at Massachusetts schools. First, the Board of Trustees of that particular school has the power to raise the tuition fee at that school. However, this prerogative has very seldom been used. The State Legislature is also given the power to raise tuition at state schools. Some members of the Legislature have filed bills calling for an increase in tuition fees.

Why do some people feel an increase is warranted/ students now pay $200 a year in tuition fees. This money goes into a general fund of the State. This means that all money going into the fund does not necessarily have to be put back into education but can be distributed to some other department in the Commonwealth.

It has been said that this year it is generally conceded that Massachusetts is in an economic bind. Many Legislator are inclined to view a raise in tuition fees as a possible source of extra revenue. This accounts for most of the bills filed dealing with tuition hikes.

Bills already filed call for a deferred tuition plan, where the tuition would be raised to a maximum of $1200 but up to $1000 of this cost could be paid back after graduation. Another bill calls for an increase in tuition for those who can afford an increase. This bill bases the tuition fee on the ability of an individual to pay.

A third set of bills calls for an increase of tuition anywhere between 35% to 60% of instructional costs at a particular school. For UMass Amherst this would mean tuition could be raised to between $800 and $1400 annually. This increase would be on top of regular room, board and activity fees.

Because the effect of these bills on student enrollment has not been studied, the Conference members felt that they could not support any of these tuition bills at the present time.

The Joint Education Committee will hold hearings on tuition bills in Boston on March 7. After hearing public sentiment on the bills, the Committee will give positive or negative recommendations for passage. The bills will then be voted on by the House and the Senate.

Members of the Conference felt that the most effective way of letting legislators know student feeling on this issue would be to encourage their respective student bodies to either visit their Legislator or write him a personal letter explaining exactly how a tuition hike would effect him personally. It was also agreed that letters to hometown newspapers would be an effective way of publicizing student viewpoints.

Another meeting of the State and Community Colleges will be held this Saturday at Quinsigamond Community College in Worcester.

Garage Rates Up To 'Break Even'

By SUSAN HUBBARD

"Parking rates have increased as of February 14 in the Campus Center parking garage in order to reach a 'break even' point in garage funding," states Donald Witkoski, manager of the Campus Center Hotel and Garage.

Rates for parking increased from $.10 per hour to $.15 per hour, with $.75 being the maximum fee for a 12 hour period. The monthly rate for student parking increased from $10.00 to $15.00.

Fees from parking go toward the maintenance of the garage as well as toward payment of construction expenses. Temporary financing and municipal bonding are employed in the payment of these original building costs.

No student funds were involved in the construction of the Campus Center garage.

First proposed in October '71, the new rate increase was given final approval just recently.

After such a proposal for increased parking rates is made, it must be submitted to a parking committee for study, then pass the Rents and Fees Committee of the Student Senate and be approved by the Board of Trustees.

Concerning traffic in the garage, Witkoski said that the number of vehicles using the facility has increased during the past school year. However, the rate increase will only bring the garage up to the self maintaining level.

"In the future, we project $50,000.00 worth of operating costs and approximately $250,000.00 for payment on the municipal bond yearly," said Witkoski.

According to William Hogan, Assistant Comptroller, temporary financing of the parking garage will be in effect at least until December '73. Permanent bonds may be issued after this date.

No additional rate increases are anticipated in the near future. "As long as other parking conditions remain the same, the garage rates will remain competitive," observed Hogan.

Belchertown-Children Suffer Most

(Editor's Note: The following is the third in a six-part series on the Belchertown State School. It was originally printed in the Springfield Union.)

Without constructive programs, children such as this cerebral palsy victim are forced to play alone. (Photo by Vinnie D'Addario)

Belchertown State School is hell for adults.

But it's the children who suffer most. They are the victims of legislative neglect and inhuman treatment practiced by the state in the name of economy.

A child's intelligence is formed in large part by the time he is seven.

"They have a genius for learning" one pre-school learning center puts it.

The President's Committee on the Mentally Retarded says "the range of an individual's intelligence is largely set in earliest childhood. It can be blunted in those same early years by a limiting, harsh, negative environment."

Largely because the staff budget and needed construction have so long been ignored by the legislators, Belchertown provides such a harsh negative environment. Experts say this can make a child more retarded.

And Belchertown can also make a normal child, placed there by mistake, a retarded individual.

Being placed in Belchertown from early childhood almost guarantees a child will never develop into a person capable of limited self care, said Dr. Phillip Wakstein.

Early placement practically insures that an individual will require an estimated 65 years of full institutional care. At a current cost of $3800 per year, that's a lifetime.

The staff itself can't be blamed for the conditions at the institution. Most are dedicated to children. Some have performed near-miracles with the young.

The General Court bears much of the blame, its short-sighted programs saving a few dollars now, but resulting in the $250,000 cost over the life of a retarded person at Belchertown.

Many of the children at Belchertown could be — with intensive individual work — educated so they could live outside Belchertown as near-normal persons.

But the children at Belchertown are mostly ignored, left to amuse themselves in any way they can. Many escape the humdrum life through insanity, just as their older counterparts elsewhere on the grounds, leaving children both retarded and seriously disturbed emotionally.

To develop to their highest potential, the children need a lot of individual attention, someone to play with them in ways that will expand their limited minds and learning power.

But one staff member isn't availabe to work long hours with four to six children. Instead there are three attendants during the day in Nursery II, a building where 34 severely retarded youngsters aged 6 to 12 live.

These people spend perhaps two hours per day working with the children. The rest of the time they spend on housekeeping chores and routine things like taking children to the bathroom.

Nursery II itself is a smaller version of the huge warehouses for adults, beds placed end to end in a sea of child- sized bunks.

The day rooms, where children spend most of their waking time, are disgraceful. There is a large room with a terazzo floor which easily can injure a young head or knee.

Hard wooden benches, replicas of prison-made seats in the adult buildings, ring the walls. Prison-made benches, are much cheaper than soft little chairs.

The television set is in a glass and steel cage, along with a couple of old auto tires and some empty plastic bottles for the kids to play with.

Mary Donoghue of Holyoke teaches at Belchertown, an example of the young and dedicated staff now coming to the institution.

She complains she has too many children to teach and not enough time to spend with each one. She can't do an effective job because each child needs a lot of individual attention.

"The attendants can't do anything either," she said. "How can they with meals to take care of, cleaning up, getting everybody to the bathroom and everything else?"

Miss Donoghue teaches in a basement classroom at Nursery II, something that would not be permitted at a normal school. The classroom is called the "Westover Room" because the Officers Wives Club at the air base donated equipment and painted the room, adding bright murals to the walls.

To reach the classroom, the children must walk down a narrow, dark concrete stairway which twists and turns. Many of the children must be carried down because they are too scared to walk down the stairs themselves.

The other staff people must take laundry and other material up and down the same stairway, the laundry bags often as wide or wider than the passage.

Conditions are a little better at Tadgell Nursery, one of the few buildings at Belchertown where someone was willing to have his name attached. But the building, opened in 1963, was designed to continue the same warehousing of people.

The walls have been painted in pastel colors, but the same endless sea of beds and the same hard-floor day rooms are there, too. There are more people to care for the children, mostly because the infants and young children must have more care.

Because there is a larger staff, more teaching can take place. Nursery school classrooms are located in the building. Seven adults supervise and teach 48 children during meals. Most of the children can feed themselves and some are learning the alphabet and other things, like numbers.

Intensive long-term play therapy is not available. A jungle gym and other playthings are in the day room, but most of the kids just sit on the floor. They don't have anyone to teach them what the jungle gym is for.

In the infirmary, where the multiple handicapped live, startling strides forward have been made. But conditions are far from ideal.

Mrs. Marion Wadsworth, assistant director of nursing and director of the federal grant program, has directed major efforts in rehabilitation.

In one section, children who used to be completely bedridden now walk, crawl or sit in wheelchairs.

The nursing staff has taught many to feed themselves. Others in the infirmary are making progress never before believed possible at Belchertown.

Other positive things include occupational therapy in ceramics, with many awards and blue ribbons given to residents at fairs and shows. A shop area produces brushes made entirely by hand, a complex operation the residents are able to learn.

But for most of the children living in Belchertown, the chronic staff shortage and the philosophy that warehousing of the retarded is the cheapest and best way to treat them means they will not reach their maximum potential.

Until Dr. M. Phillip Wakstein, former regional director of mental retardation for the Department of Mental Health, put a new policy into effect less than a year ago, death was almost the only exit from the institution.

It still is no easy task to be discharged from Belchertown. Nearly three years ago two 4-year-old children were admitted. One year later they were diagnosed as deaf — not necessarily retarded. It took more than a year after their deafness was discovered for the two children to be released.

Fortunately the character of Belchertown is starting to change, though slowly. Admissions have been curtailed for all but emergency cases in an attempt to reduce the overcrowded conditions. The institution is now about 30 per cent over capacity.

Because of new state-supported programs, all but the most severely retarded can be kept at home or in their own communities.

Unfortunately, because of a lack of appropriations, many people who would benefit by these programs are still being institutionalized.

Eventually, Belchertown will become strictly a long-term residential care center, the trainable residents who now help operate the institution giving way to an entirely paid staff.

But Belchertown should not now, or in the future, continue to be an institution which blunts the development of the very children and adults it should be making self-sufficient.

It should be a crime to strip the humanity from its residents, warehousing them like cold-storage eggs, forcing them into insanity as an escape from the humdrum existence the commonwealth forces upon them.

Bored of Trustees

Another play in the theatre of the absurd took place yesterday on the twenty-first floor of the Saltonstall building. The Trustees had their monthly meeting. As time passes, though, it looks as though the actors have become more serious. Imagine-yesterday's meeting was so anticipated as to cause the trustees to forego lunch!

More seriously, though, the trustees seem to possess as a body very little to interest students. Any work of major importance that comes before the Board is handled in secret meeting before the Board makes their monthly public appearance. When the trustees do get around to letting the press and the students have a peek at what's going on, anything crucial to student or academic affairs has already been dealt with. They feed their constituents the crumbs of their lunchtime discussion and, one and one-half hours later, having fulfilled their duties as Trustees of the University of Massachusetts, they retire, yawns hidden behind self-righteous smiles.

Where does this leave the student? Impaled on the sharp end of the stick, so to speak. You may well get a group together and go to the meeting with hopes of disrupting it and getting something constructive done. But it hardly seems worth it. Between the police and the monotonous red tape, you'll find yourself yawning, too.

James Gold

Three groups entertained the trustees at their monthly meeting held yesterday at the Saltonstall Building in Boston. The meeting, which was originally scheduled to be held in a restaurant at Westminster was moved to the Boston site to both allow more people in to see it and because it is easier to secure a state owned building than a private restaurant.

The meeting was called to order by Chairman Healy, who stated that the different protest groups would be heard in their entirety after the scheduled agenda was completed.

After accepting the minutes of the previous meeting, President Wood made his statement, which will have the most immediate impact on all concerned with the University: The University will operate under a "standstill" budget of $72,530,052. The trustees originally asked for $88,822,775. President Wood stated "no new faculty positions are authorized for any of our campuses," and that the total enrollment will grow by 1,684 new students.

He indicated a pattern of "large classes and little leeway for innovation" in the future will result from tight budgets. He also stated that financial aid per student will drop seven per cent, even though costs are rising.

As the other items on the agenda were taken up, the protest groups present began to grow restless. After circulating a ballot among themselves, they decided that enough of the usual items were taken care of and that it was time to go on to the more important matters of the day: military recruiting on the Boston campus, the local housing conditions at the Dorchester area (near the new home of UMass-Boston), and the Frieda Salzman case.

The trustees wanted none of these disruptions out of order and continued their meeting while several members of the protest group started speeches on their own. Much of what was said by both sides was lost to the stale air of the room.

The trustees' reactions to the hubbub ranged from amusement to resentment. Most remained amused in an all of manner.

When the trustees finished their business, the student groups began theirs. Protestors were heard in a slightly more orderly fashion. They were rightfully resentful of the many State Capitol Police, small meeting room, and large numbers of journalists and photographers in attendance.

Apparently, President Wood had previously ordered an orderly meeting. As people first entered, the man in charge of security was telling people where to sit. Because of his decision in placement, i.e. straight looking people sitting in the front, the student protestors would probably have liked to tell the security chief where to sit.

John Hopkins, a UMass-Boston student was permitted to address the trustees on their decision voiding the ban on militarv recruitment at the Boston campus. As is usually done, the trustees promised to make a further study of the case.

Hopkins probably turned off some of the trustees when he accused them of their complicity in the Vietnam War. Some of them were just not able to relate to the idea that on campus military recruiting adds to the war effort.

Speaking for a group who think that Dorchester rents are being raised and poor people are being evicted in favor of higher paying college students near the Columbia Point campus, Mike Levi, a UMB student, stopped just short of accusing the trustees of a conflict of interest in profiteering from land holdings in that area. President Wood calmly shot Levi down by asking him the current eviction rates in that area. Wood went on to say that a study in that area had already been made. Levi asked if the rich trustees could understand the problems of the poor Dorchesterites. The question was successfully evaded.

Several times when audience participation threatened to get out of hand, five to seven additional police officers entered the room, quickly to be shooed out again by their superior officer. Once, the crowd shouted "cops out, students in."

In what was probably the only well presented speech, Ms. Frieda Salzman accused the trustees of being unresponsive to faculty members and all rational appeals. She asked that the trustees charge the Faculty and Educational Policy Committee of the Board to hold open hearings on her case.

George Salzman directly asked the Board why his wife could not see what was held in her secret files. That went unanswered.

After watering down a motion by Lee Sandwen, Student trustee and Student Senate President, the board agreed to release the main issues to be decided in this case. George Salzman appeared satisfied that he got to say what he said even though he was never directly answered.

The meeting went about twenty minutes beyond its usual ending time of 3:30. The real nitty-gritty work supposedly took place at the secret meeting held a half hour before the public meeting.

When it was all over, police were lined up in the hallway outside the meeting room. Students, especially those of the long-haired type, felt abused. But that did not matter to the trustees, who apparently felt very secure.

On Dining With Al Lowenstein

In more formal societies, the guest of honor is seated to the right of the host. Everyone dines sumptuously, and later over brandy the guest star is approached by each of the guests, who say nice things to him immediately, and quote him later to impress their friends. Unless the guest is a woman, in which case they quote her. (See Sexual Politics, Semantics.)

Project Ten is hardly a formal society. Dave Hoffman's apartment seats four people around the table for dinner, and there were about twenty people to feed. The sumptuous dinner included roast beef and pastrami sandwiches, no brandy, and was consumed from the lap on various couches and chairs. Billed as "Dinner with Allard Lowenstein," it was turning into dinner with Bonnie Patch, or Tina Stromstead, or if you were really lucky, Rich Dinkin. All the dinner participants knew each other, except for our guest, who was known by everyone, but familiar to few. How does one make easily the transition between Project Ten Colloquy and Conversation with Allard Lowenstein? No matter how nice a guy he is, and he is, it's hard to begin a casual, suitable-to-dinner talk with someone who is, after all, (I will say it boldly) famous. Most of us are still affected in a curious way by fame. Famous people are famous, and we do quote them, or at the very least drop their names unless we have some remarkable quality which I lack. (Tricky Dick Nixon will probably boast to Chou En-lai that he actually MET Vida Blue. That should get him about as far as his "long march to peace" bullshit.) And anyway, Al was sitting over in a corner of the room with Lee Sandwen and a few other people, so that those of us sitting in the couch/chair horsehoe part of the room would have had to violate the ethics of cool to try to talk with him.

As a result, the dinner part of "Dinner with Allard Lowenstein" differed from an ordinary dinner only in that Hoffman did the shopping. I for one was worried. (I worry a lot.) What if the affair falls flat on its face? It didn't.

Everyone finished eating and there was some moving around. The conversation which was most open to newcomers, and most promising, was over at the feet of Charles Adams, our peerless Director who looks like Stanley Kubrick (the director). Charles was talking with Jim LaMacchia(you know Him), Reb Howe (editor of Genesis), and Dave Michaelson (see Editorial Points) about Kubrick's new film, A Clockwork Orange (Jim says "See it!" So does Dave. Charles has only read the book.).

During this time Al Lowenstein had moved to the chair next to Charles, in perhaps the one seat in the one room from which one can comfortably talk to twenty people without addressing them. The dynamics were now such that a proper lead might turn the thing into what everybody wanted in the first place. Giving credit, David Duncan was the first to pose a transforming question. (A transforming question is one which causes the transformation from a room in which there are several private conversations going on between people who see each other every day into a room where people listen to a guy who knows a hell of a lot about this country, how its run, how it could be run differently, and how to get from here to there.)

We talked about the election, whether it was important, whether most people could be persuaded to believing it was indeed important, whether Pete Rozelle and Ed McMahon was indeed a preferable ticket to Nixon-Agnew. Everyone who stops and thinks about it realizes that Nixon has already appointed four people to the Supreme Court, and could appoint two more in the next four years. This wasn't mentioned. Al did mention in the same vein the regulatory agencies of the federal government whose memberships are appointed by the President, which don't regulate under Nixon. The perfundity of day-to-day government operations is elusive, because what we the public see of it is bureaucratic busywork, but the President does not exist in a vacuum, and what he has by way of Executive Department manpower determines whether he will execute the law, as required by the Constitution, or ignore it, as Nixon does in a dozen ways every day. The point is that the difference is greater than it seems to those of us who see no difference between Nixon and his opponents.

I admit that if Edmund Muskie is elected President, Angela Davis will probably not be freed. The Pentagon will probably not be brought under Presidential control (See Bureaucracy, workings of). But I believe that if everyone listened to Al Lowenstein once, they would vote for Muskie, if it comes to that, to get rid of Nixon. It's not a matter of charisma. Let Lindsay bring the charisma, Lowenstein brings the facts. If you didn't hear him last night at eight, you missed something you shouldn't have missed.

It was a successful "After-dinner With Al Lowenstein." Thanks for inviting me, Dave. Shalom.

Letters To The Editor

Department of Environmental Sciences

To the Editor:

Professor Warren Litsky asks whether precise data was collected to determine the truth about renaming the Department of Environmental Sciences to the Department of Agricultural and Environmental Microbiology (MD C February 22, 1972). Our critic should suffer his own admonition and be less hasty in assuming that he is the sole possessor ot truth.

In drawing our petition to the Graduate Student Senate, signed by all the Department of Microbiology graduate students, we had in our possession memoranda from Dr. Litsky to Dean Spielman, Dean Buck to the Academic Matters Committee, and Provost Gluckstern to various deans and department heads. These and further conversations with an Academic Matters Committeeman and Dean Gentile and subsequent to the proposal-Dean Edds, fully satisfied us that we understood the substance and illusive essence of the proposal to which we objected.

Our proposal to the Graduate Sentate contained three points. First, since the Department of Environmental Sciences is not now a "legitimate" department the proposed "Department of Agricultural and Environmental Microbiology" involves the creation of a new department on this campus. We do not feel that there is any real academic justification for a proliferation of departments in this time of fiscal stringency. Second, the name of the proposed department will conflict with the already existing Department of Microbiology causing confusion which would "unfairly detract from the nationally acknowledged quality implied by a degree from the Department of Microbiology, University of Massachusetts at Amherst." The third point was amply outlined in the February 16, 1972 MDC. It expressed the feat that a National Institutes of Health Training Grant currently held by the Department of Microbiology might be unfavorably reviewed if another department of microbiology were created at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Finally, Dr. Litsky fails to mention in his letter that he declined a personal invitation from the Graduate Student Senate President to address the Senate which is still in the process of confirming Truth "by inspection and delay."

Who Are You?

To the Editor:

Can you consider yourself really you--or someone else? From my observation lately, I've just come to realize how phoney people really are. Why do we have to play so many roles in our society? Don't you think that if we stopped playing such games with ourselves and others, we would have more self-confidence and we could face ourselves for what we are instead of what everyone wants us to be. People can see right through you! Be yourself! Be real!

Thank You

To the Editor:

I just wanted to write to publicly thank the girl who returned my pocketbook last week. Not only was it good to have the money and license back but it did a lot "to restore my faith in human nature" at a time when I really needed it. Who says UMASS is all apathy and crime? Thanks again.

Polish Jokes

To the Editor:

I was offended by Editorial Points in yesterday's paper. Being myself a Polish-American, I grow wearier and wearier as I hear each new and sparkling Polish joke. If you people have to slur us Polacks, as you probably call us, why can't you do it in private, where we could settle it like men, or in some other way restrain from printing your individual prejudices?

Last summer my wife's sister Blance came to visit us. The little tart had been run out of town for sleeping around, and she had the nerve to call ME a Polack! I guess I showed her. Any way, you smart, you print no more Polish jokes.

Stealing MDC's

To the Editor:

It was a clear day. The sun made the frozen snow sparkle. It wasn't the type of day that one would expect such a disastrous occurence as I was about to witness. Walking back from my one o'clock class--minding my own business, like all good students--I couldn't help but see--God forgive me--David Booth steal a Daily Collegian. That's right America! I saw David Booth STEAL the student newspaper right in front of at least a hundred UMies in the Student Union Lobby--of all places!

I don't know if I was the only awe-stricken plebeian to catch this Master of Deceit, but I very likely was. I followed Him from Machmer Hall--where they teach the Science of Political Deception--straight into the Student Union Lobby. If it were not for my great and humble respect for this Master of Masters, I wouldn't have caught Him red- handed, as it were.

At any rate, He stopped right by the stairs leading to the Hatch, and as I approached cautiously for an audience, I SAW HIM--I still can't believe it--like a magician of some sort, reach down and rip-off one of the Daily Collegians.

Have you ever read the Autobiography of Malcolm X? The part where Malcolm found out that Elijah Mohamoud had had intercourse with one of his secretaries? Malcolm X was flabbergasted, his faith destroyed. That's exactly how I felt when I saw the Faculty Cahouna commit this act of larceny and deceit.

It was just sitting there, in its little box with the rest of the Collegians, for the students who pay for them. Who would have thought that a Faculty member, never mind their Leader, would stoop so low as to rip-off the Student Newspaper?! I wouldn't have been so surprised if it were the New York Times or something of equal status. That would have been more suitable for a faculty crook--BUT THE DAILY COLLEGIAN??!! How low can this Slayer of Academic Dragons go??

Stealing a Daily Collegian!! A newspaper that students in their own humble way strive to create five days a week with student money for student consumption. I would ask Chairman Dave to pay for the stolen paper but I wouldn't think it worth money to someone of His stature, but then again I wouldn't expect it to be worth the effort of stealing for Him either.

I hope this sort of thing doesn't catch on with the rest of the faculty. Think of the expense to the students, but even more importantly think of the integrity of the faculty.

I submit this article--or whatever you choose to call it--with full awareness of Chairman Dave's Right of Divine Retribution. And I am willing to submit myself to that punishment if it is His will--but then again, if He doesn't steal any more Collegians I won't have to worry about that, will I?...Good night, david.

Wood's Statement

Statement of President Robert Wood to the Board of Trustees on the Educational Consequences of the 1972 Executive Budget Requests

On January 26, the General Court received the executive budget requests for fiscal year 1972-73. Last week, specific details of the request for the University became available and were carefully reviewed by the campuses and in my office.

Put simply, it is a standstill budget. It increases funds only to cover the increased cost of what we do now. But, we are expected to enroll substantially more students. As now constituted, the budget threatens the University.

–The total request the Trustees transmitted last August of $88,822,775 has been reduced to $72,530,052.

–No new faculty positions are authorized for any of our campuses, although the enrollment of 1,684 additional students has been accepted.

Together, with state and community colleges we have been requested to take sharp reductions from our budget requests in dollars and in teaching positions.

These reductions constitute double jeopardy for quality education. They fail to provide sufficient revenue to meet present needs and commitments. For the years ahead, they threaten to establish a pattern of large classes and little leeway for innovation.

The budget represents a sharp break with the pattern of financing customary for over ten years. In doing so, it imperils the goodname of the University. Offers to faculty for 1972-73 have been made in good faith and in the donfidence that there would be new positions in response to increased enrollment. They have been accepted in good faith.

With stand-still funding and frozen positions comes a third restraint: inadequate scholarships and financial aid. For the third year the recommended appropriation for financial aid and for aid to disadvantaged students is $1,550,000--in contrast to the real need request the University made of $5,414,000 plus $282,000 for tutorial programs. With a growing enrollment next fall, the figure of $1,550,000 means aid per student will drop 7%--while costs increase and needs grow.

The University is fully conscious of the financial plight of the Commonwealth. We are taking every possible step within our means to effect economies and to stretch dollars in areas where the quality of education is not impaired. But, we will work for the restoration of faculty positions that will permit us to fulfill our obligation to our students and to maintain the good name of the University. We must work for a financial aid program that meets at least the minimal needs of our students.

We can acknowledge the growing costs of welfare to the state. But, we know that the welfare load will never be effectively reduced by subsidy alone--although we all know that subsidy today to be presently justified. It will be reduced primarily when every person who desires an education receives as much education as he or she can possibly absorb. This is the task of the University, in company with the other segments of public higher education. It is a task for which we must find more resources this year.

Great Leaps Forward

Cost Of Living Going Up

WASHINGTON (AP) — Inflation shoved the cost of living upward in January for the second month following the price-wage freeze, but the price push was less painful than December's.

The Labor Department reported that consumer prices increased 0.1 per cent in January, a month when they usually decline. When adjusted for such seasonal trends, the rise was at a rate of 0.3 per cent or 3.6 per cent a year.

This encouraged White House economists who, a month ago, had forecast a repeat of December's 0.4 per cent increase, or worse. they long have predicted a Phase 2 bulge lasting several months.

The 3.6 per cent annual rate compared with less than 2 per cent during the freeze and 4.1 per cent in the six months before President Nixon's mid-August order clamping a 90-day lid on prices, wages and rents.

The 0.3 per cent inflation took 3 cents out of every $ 10 bill. It sent the consumer price index up to 123.2 per cent of the 1967 average, meaning that it now costs a city family $12.32 to buy what $10 bought five years ago.

Meat and new cars were among the major offenders against price stability. The upsurge in meat prices, which has sparked consumer protests in Washington and elsewhere, amounted to 1.5 per cent.

New-car prices jumped 1.6 per cent as price boosts approved by the Price Commission took effect, but used-car prices followed the usual downward seasonal pattern by declining 1.8 per cent.

The food price index as a whole declined 0.2 per cent in January despite the contrary movement meats and dairy products.

This was an important shift in trend for family budgets. Food prices had risen 0.7 per cent in each of the two preceding months. Curiously, the reversal was largely attributable to two foods which are exempt from price control, eggs and fresh vegetables.

Despite the usual splurge of January white sales and post-holiday clearances, the price index for all non-food commodities declined only 0.3 per cent, less than the usual seasonal decrease.

The January sales did reduce the costs of apparel and textile housefurnishings, however. Other important decreases were reported in gasoline and shoes.

But housing costs went up. Home-ownership costs rose 0.6 per cent, partly because of increased property taxes, and rentals rose 0.2 per cent. Transportation costs also climbed; transit fares rose in New York and elsewhere.

But the income tax relief provisions which took effect Jan. 1 eased the continued climb in prices. The spendable earnings of a married worker with three dependents, rose by 62 cents in January because of the smaller tax bite out of his paycheck. His average weekly pay as $115.61, or 6.9 per cent higher than a year ago.

When adjusted for price increases, the real spendable income of such wage-earners in January was 0.5 per cent above the December level and 3.4 per cent above a year ago.

Cigarettes Down; Small Cigars Up

WASHINGTON (AP) — The tobacco industry is manufacturing fewer cigarettes while sharply increasing production of small cigars, a report by the internal Revenue Service shows.

In one month alone, last December, production of small cigars more than doubled over December 1970 while the number of cigarettes manufactured declined, the report said.

The statistics may foreshadow a new fight over the little cigar, which anti-smoking forces have labeled "a cigarette in brown paper."

The little cigar not only is exempt from the federal ban on televised cigarette advertising but is taxed at a lower rate than cigarettes.

Charles already have been made on Capitol Hill that the tobacco industry is attempting to circumvent the ban on cigarette advertising by pushing the small cigar.

Sen. Frank Moss, D-Utah, said Congress should consider extending the ban to little cigars.

But the report shows the small cigar still is a long way from replacing the cigarette.

IRS said the tobacco industry manufactured 39.8 billion cigarettes last December compared with 42.3 billion in December 1970. But the number of small cigars rose to 150 million from the 68.9 million in December 1970.

In the six months that ended December 1971, the report noted that the industry made 288.4 billion cigarettes, down from 297 billion in the six months that ended December 1970.

Tropics Coming To Southwest

By PAMELA PHILLIPS

Picture people walking around with tropical plants in their hands and smiles on their faces. It is happening this week at the Southwest Environment Concerns Class. They have been selling small potted plants in Southwest dorm lobbies. And that is not all they have been up to.

The Environmental Concerns 390 class, under direction of Raymond Werbe, has started, completed and planned many projects since its beginning last semester. Werbe, the Director of the Office of Environmental Concerns, offered the three-credit course upon demand due to the huge success of a similar colloquium last Spring. The enrollment of 40 in the fall jumped to 104 this semester and Mr. Werbe would like to see further growth. Based on theory and practica, the course is designed to let the students work on projects to improve their environment while being exposed to the basis of good design, architecture and other factors.

"The aim of this course is to make the environment more responsive for the people who live here," said Werbe. The students decide on the areas they want to better then, working with the University, get to work. The Physical Plant officials and other members of the University have been more than cooperative, lending not only the facilities but helping hands.

One of the most successful of the projects has been the skating rink and warming hut or yurt behind Pierpont.

Even though winter was slow in coming, now that it's here--the rink is getting plenty of use. The students work closely with the Physical Plant personnel and are in constant touch with Ken Billing, head of grounds, as to the maintenance of the rink

E. C. 390 made the tropica plants available to Southwes students for 35¢ instead of th normal cost of 60-90, hoping to ad a little life to the otherwise bleak winter weeks ahead. The idea wa a success, and 2,000 plants wer sold in the first two weeks.

Last Fall, the 390 class sponsore "Southwest Bay". That Saturday 300 to 400 students took part in th planting of some 4,000 bulbs an the painting of the background fo graphic art in the Southwes tunnel. This Spring, Southwest wi be blooming with crocus, daffodil and tulips. Students will be walkin under Mass. Ave. through brightly designed tunnel.

William Lambert, UMass lan scape architect, recommende where the bulbs should be plante and arrangements have been mad for maintenance of these beds an others that will be added th Spring.

The group has some excitin plans for Southwest when th weather breaks this spring and hoping for the same enthusias that it received in the past from th residents of Southwest.

Mr. Werbe is assisted by severa specialists in teaching his clas The team is made up of Charle Lydiard, industrial designe Mark Haber, an MIT architec Maryanne Rumney, a Yale le turer and graphic designe William Copperthwaite, yu designer; and Henry Wood.

Best Issue Raises Questions

By DOUGLAS PATCH

Last year, following a lengthy controversy, Michael Best of the Economics Department received a reappointment for one year. Although the Dean's Council of the College of Arts and Sciences recommended an appointment for two years, the provost vetoed it and called for a one year appointment. The reasons for this veto included a question of Best's competence in researching and publishing material and a controversy within the Economics Department itself.

Professor Michael Best (MDC Staff Photo)

With the one year appointment expiring this year, the entire issue will be raised again. The issue, however, seems to involve factors of great importance to the University and to education as a whole

ProfessorBest feels that it raises the question of a teacher's commitment to diversity, to providing what he calls "a vibrant and stimulating environment" for education. According to him, the purpose of education is to "develop people to their fullest intellectual potential," a purpose, which he feels, is not being achieved, but which every student should demand and expect to get. The achievement of this goal Best believes is next to impossible when a professor has 1600 students over his first four semesters of college teaching, as he did.

In his opinion, we must build up the content and the quality of the undergraduate program, and work toward "tearing down the barriers to student-faculty interaction." When academic professionalism has been replaced by true commitment, Prof. Best feels that we shall be closer to realizing the true purpose of education.

Nursing Students To Meet Candidate For Dean Today

There will be a meeting at the School of Nursing Conference Room on Thursday, February 24, 1972, from 3:30- 4:30 p.m. All nursing students are invited to meet Dr. Ingeborg Mauksch, a candidate for Dean of the School. Punch and cookies will be served and there will be a chance to talk informally with Dr. Mauksch.

Dr. Mauksch is a graduate of Massachusetts General Hospital School of Nursing in Boston, and obtained her Ph.D. from the University of Chicago. She is currently Associate Professor of Nursing, Department of Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation, School of Medicine, University of Missouri, Columbia.

Debaters Tie Rhody

By STEPHEN FISHER

Last night an exhibition debate between the University of Massachusetts Debate Team and the university of Rhode Island Debate Team ended in a tie. The outcome was decided by an audience vote.

The UMass team argued affirmatively that "force is the midwife of every old society pregnant with a new one." They contended, more specifically, that women are the controlling force in any society. They stated that women control men first mentally. They are the primary teachers of children, instilling their values in those who actually conduct the alteration of a society. They also control men physically, using their physical and intellectual guile to influence males. The team used the examples of Sampson and Delilah and Adam and Eve.

The speakers from U.R.I., debating on the negative side of the topic, pointed out that women are generally excluded from positions of power. They also contended that guile and indirect influence are not actual force. It was claimed by the U.R.I. debaters that societal changes are brought about by economic and political factors. These points were argued by both teams throughout the debate.

Representing UMass were Roger Legendre, a junior, and James Lane, a sophomore. The visitors from U.R.I. were Bonnie King, a sophomore, and Stephen Erickson, a junior. All debaters are Political Science majors.

The U.R.I. team, under the direction of Professor Richard Roth, is presently making a debating tour of the Universities of Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine, and McGill University in Montreal.

The Sensual Way Of Doing It

By TONY GRANITE

THE SENSUOUS STUDENT is the title of a clever bit of satire by "MJ" that helps students "to realize the potential of all his senses and how to use them in the classroom."

It appears in the Georgia State Signal.

Some advice: "The Sensuous Student must learn to dress like his professor most prefers."

"The student should take precautions to brush his teeth, gargle with mouth freshener, and use a strong deodorant."

"Those that sit at the front of the class get the best grades."

Practice such simple exercises as "Chew a pencil. This exercise will improve the motions of your jaw and will allow a greater sense of freedom when you speak."

NEWEST STUDENT MEDIUM at Central Washington State is a monthly newspaper that tells what American Indians are all about.

According to a dispatch in the Campus Crier, "The Native American staff hopes to publish 1,500 copies of their newspaper and distribute them on campus, in Yakima Valley towns, other colleges, prisons and reformatories."

And the truth shall make them free.

BOOZE POWER was displayed in a recent issue of the Ball State University's Daily News with a one-line editorial.

It was the Indianapolis telephone number of Governor Edgar D. Whitcomb.

The occasion: pressure of church groups and others urging the Governor to veto a bill lowering the drinking age for Hoosiers to 18.

The wire services carried the item. And we found it in Indiana U. Daily Student.

They have a thirst.

FIRE POWER of The Daily Reveille at Louisiana State U. showed up on its front page, lately. Seems that an investigative team of three student staffers found 60 violations of state fire prevention laws and so reported to the Administration.

When there was no local action taken, the report was filed with the state fire marshall's office. The result is an impending visit by a team of inspectors.

One campus official told the Reveille that "the University was exempt from state laws which require school buildings to have fire alarms because the buildings were built before the laws were passed."

A front page story tells that the University did move immediately to correct some discrepancies not in the Reveille's expose piece.

"A new license plate, a new fire extinguisher and two refilled extinguishers have appeared on the campus fire truck."

The power of the press is to be reckoned.

FUZZ ACADEMY is being set up at Middle Tennessee State, according to a story in Sidelines, the student newspaper there.

The four-year degree program is being funded by the Tennessee Law Enforcement Agency, beginning Spring semester 1973.

Spock Says To "Wise Up" To Nixon's Salesmanship

BOSTON (AP) — Dr. Benjamin Spock Wednesday said the Nixon visit to China has "positive points" but that the American people should not believe that the U.S. has a new Asian policy.

"Trips like this one to China will please the American people," said the noted pediatrician and antiwar advocate. "We like to see our leaders greeted ceremoniously."

But Spock said he "hopes the people will wise up" and realize the United States is still in Asia with old policies.

"Nixon is a good salesman of his policies," Spock said, "and things like 'Vietnamization' lead people to believe we are disengaging in Southeast Asia."

The People's Party presidential candidate said U.S. ground troops are being withdrawn from Vietnam but air and naval forces are being increased. He said the war isn't winding down but "just shifting."

In other matters, Spock told a press conference that poor people contribute more to society in taxes and services than they receive from welfare.

"The poor are being asked to pay for the prosecution of wars," Spock said.

He said that payment was through taxes, poor social services and through men from poor backgrounds being drafted in what he said was out of proportion to their numbers.

Spock said the federal government did not raise taxes to pay for the Southeast Asia war but instead cut back "unnecessary expenses," which he said are in the form of health care and social services.

Spock cited a 1969 study made by the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington which he says shows that the poor carry their fair share in this country

Newman Coffehouse Opens

Looking for a change of pace? A warm and smiling room which offers you a chance to meet people, rap, and sing-a-long to your favorite music? The monthly Newman Coffee House opens its doors this Saturday night, February 26, at 8:00 PM. It will be happening in the Newman Social Lounge.

This coffee house will be free and open to everyone. Anyone who wants to perform is welcome, as well as those who just want to sit back and relax. Meet some old friends and make some new ones. Floor cushions, candles, and free refereshments will be provided. Promoters say a great opportunity for an enjoyable evening will be available. They hope you'll come down and have a "fun time", and ask you to bring a friend or a guitar, or both.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Research now indicates that the composition of human blood can be altered by sunspots. Magnetic disturbances coincide with certain planetary positions. Psychiatric admissions, in turn, increase during magnetic storms. The ultimate contribution of astrology to knowledge about ourselves and the world in which we live can and will be great indeed. Humorously, as each astrological factor is accepted, astronomers attempt to label it "astronomy."

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Practical issues dominate. You can get things done. Build on solid base. Leave wishful thinking to others. Creative endeavor succeeds if you are prepared. Means discard haphazard methods. Be serious about success.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Accent on short journeys, messages, relations with close relatives. Older woman may make demands. Be willing to learn. If patient, you receive surprise of pleasant variety. You may be called upon to explain position.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Emphasis is on what you own and how you utilize assets. Debts can be paid and collected. Information is available. Be selective. Avoid trying too much, too soon. Obtain hint from Taurus message.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Lunar cycle high; judgment improves. You perceive what is needed and you can do something about it. Take initiative. Make new starts in new directions. Stress independence, originality. Buy new apparel.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You succeed by working in conjunction with organization, civic or charitable group. Routine changes. Intellectual curiosity is sparked. You come alive. Be involved. You'll be happier as result.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Adjustment occurs in domestic area. Friendlier atmosphere prevails. Some of your desires can be fulfilled. Surprise gift is highlighted. Socialize. Improve public relations. General gain is shown.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Accent on ambitions, aspirations. You may have to realign priorities. One you respect pays tribute. That's fine, but don't fall victim to false flattery. Get agreements, promises in writing.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Good lunar aspect now coincides with long-range plans, success which comes from past efforts. Keep communication lines open. You get credit for efforts. This is overdue, but avoid any display of bitterness.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Investment pays off; your views are vindicated. Study Scorpio message. Put finishing touches on project, assignment. Money discussion is on agenda. Be frank but understanding. Mate, partner is involved.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Let others show their hands. Take special care with legal papers, procedures. Time is on your side. You will gain access to additional information. Don't rush decisions. Playing waiting game now is winning game.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Go slow. Obtain hint from Capricorn message. Steady progress should be advocated over sensational gains. One who advises otherwise is ill-informed. Give credit to friend who performs special service.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Favorable lunar aspect now means you can fulfill creative urge. Break free from rut, emotional or otherwise. Excitement of greater self-discovery is featured. Be ready for change, variety, possible travel.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you have sense of harmony. You are poetic, imaginative, capable of making abstract ideas come to life. For you, love can be all--and, by August, there will be constructive outlet for emotions. Some basic relationships are subject to change. Don't hang on to past.

Betancourt-Pagliara Combo Started With Showdown

By MARK VOGLER

It was just another high school basketball game for the majority of the folks on hand. But for the captains of the Ramapo and Westwood High School squads, it meant a little more.

Being highly sought after college prospects in the state of New Jersey, the opposing floor generals performed their best before a Rutgers coach who had attended the game for recruitment purposes. The contest went right down the wire. There was a loose ball and the two captains scrambled for it. It was rather fitting to have the nip and tuck battle develop into a showdown between the game's top two scorers.

In the midst of the scuffle, one of the players finally got hold of the ball and lofted in a ten foot desperation shot as the horn sounded, thus giving Ramapo a one-point edge. The young man who turned in the heroics was Mike Pagliara, a 5'10" guard who would later draw a basketball scholarship to the University of Massachusetts. The player he beat on defense was John Betancourt, a backcourt standout of identical size who would also attend UMass via a scholarship.

UMASS CAPTAIN MIKE PAGLIARA pumps a jump shot over the head of a Rhode Island defender. (MDC photo by Gib Fullerton)

The man who was directly responsible for their recruitment was UMass freshman coach Peter Broaca, who had by the way, piloted Pascock Hills High (Montvale, N.J.) two years earlier in the same league that Pagliara participated in. The fact that Broaca had know the two players from a summer league helped to establish sound relations which would reward his freshman program the following winter.

As it turned out, Betancourt and Pagliara, who were just acquaintances, discovered they were going to the same university. Finding they had things in common, like their major (Business Administration), they made a request to the coaches that they might room together. They've done so for four years now, and have established a strong friendship in the process. They pledged together at Kappa Sigma fraternity and have spent many hours playing basketball together.

That's how it all began. Now, just four years afterward, Pagliara and Betancourt have mushroomed into one of the finest backcourt combinations that UMass has ever seen, and Head Coach Jack Leaman will be the first to tell you so.

"In a school that has a history of good backcourt men, these two are probably the most successful that we've had. I think that Pag is a steady, team leader, floor general type who rarely does the spectacular but always does the job he has to do.

"John is the spectacular, crowd pleasing type who loves to gamble. And sometimes his gambling will hurt you. He's one of the greatest street players I've ever seen. And when he gets the hot lick, he'll put the ball in from anywhere on the court. And he has a tendency to play well in the very important games."

They compliment each other just perfectly. Both are unselfish. Mike realizes when John has a hot lick and gives the ball to him. John respects Mike for this, but wishes that Mike would shoot the ball more often. Together they make a very fine pair. And certainly if they were 6'11" or 6' 2" they'd be with some of the finest guards in the United States."

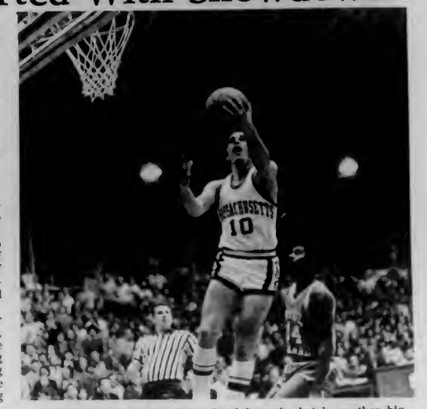
As freshmen for Coach Broaca's unbeatibles (1968-69) who compiled a 15-0 mark, Betancourt and Pagliara paved the way in the backcourt, averaging better than 13 points apiece. Both credit Coach Broaca, who was appointed as head hoop mentor at Coast Guard in the spring, for molding them into complete ball players.

Pagliara said of his former coach: "Neither of us were actually good on defense until Coach Broaca made us realize that for two guys as small as us to play on a collegiate level we'd had better learn to play defense. Not many teams have a pair of short guards starting."

Betancourt recalled:: "When we came here as freshmen we were one-man teams. Coach Broaca taught us to play as a unit. I had to adapt from the high school style of playing zones to the UMass way of doing things--which was man-to-man. And Coach Broaca showed me how."

Living together with another athlete does have its advantages, especially if you play on the same athletic team. Besides getting familiar with a guy's playing techniques and style, you are able to come to a mutual understanding as Pagliara points out:

"Rooming with John for so long has probably made basketball a lot more enjoyable. I've gotten the reputation of the ball handler, and he the scorer. It gets so every time I give 'em a good pass, he thanks me for it. We get to understand and interpret each others moves on the court.



"It's been a real pleasure playing with him. We're developed a better friendship because of this. I have a lot of respect for him as a player and a person."

The players' evaluation of each other now as compared to the night of their schoolboy march-up is quite similar.

Pagliara: "John used to throw 'em up from everywhere when he played. And he didn't play for a very good team either. He was an excellent deep shooter, he didn't take the ball to the basket. They'd set up picks for him. That's the same way he is now. You get 'em open and he'll stick it in. With Coach Broaca's help he has developed into a very fine defensive player. He has always been a hustler up here."

Betancourt: "Offensively, Mike drove a lot and forced plenty of fouls on the opposition. He could shoot from the outiside and shoot really well, but he'd go one-on-one to the bucket for the most part. He didn't do badly either. His defensive game wasn't as equally impressive.

"Right now I consider him an excellent ball handler, a good defensive player, he could score more points-- but he goes to the other guys more often than shooting himself. He's not allowed to drive because he's considered too small. I think it's a mistake because I know Mike can do it well."

When you talk about Pagliara, you have to mention Betancourt. And when you speak of Betancourt, you mustn't exclude Pagliara. That's the way it has been now for the past three years. Julius Erving was certainly a boon to the ball club, but you've got to equate some of the success to the cogs who make the UMass backcourt go. Check UMass' credentials during their varsity career and you'll see why.

As sophomores the two guards aided the Redmen to a New England championship and their first NIT bid with an 18-7 log. Last year they helped spearhead UMass to a second NIT berth and a school record of 23-4, not to mention an undefeated Yankee Conference season. This year team success has slacked off without the services of Erving, but there still remains a very slim chance of a tourney entry--but UMass faces a must-win-all situation as team captain Pagliara elaborated:

"We have to win all five remaining games, and even if we do that we're not assured of making the NIT this year. But then again, I believe that there's still a chance. There are not too many good teams in New England this year. Providence will certainly take an NCAA ticket.

"If we don't go on and do well, then we won't even be considered. But if it comes down to us and Holy Cross, we'll probably take it because of the fact that we beat 'em in regular season play. But we've got to win the conference and beat Rhody. That goes without saying."

Prior to the UNH game Betancourt ranked 11th in scoring on the all-time UMass list with 873 career points. Tim Edwards '67 (1022), Pete Bernard '64 (978), and Charley O'Rourke '65 (924) are still within his reach of overtaking before his collegiate days terminate. With 281 assists the All-YanCon veteran is just 11 shy of Ray Ellerbrook's ('70) mark. Joey DiSarcina ('69) hold that record safely with 431.

Pagliara's personal statistics aren't quite as impressive until you take into consideration that he sacrifices his shooting skill for the sake of passing, ball handling, and defensive tasks. He has scored 508 points and has made 203 assists during his career thus far.

With Erving to uncork some magnificent passes the previous two years, Pagliara and Betancourt were often the key men to go to on the break-aways. But with Julius what can you do? Betancourt substantiated the situation on the fast breaks: "No rebounds this year. We're certainly not rebounding as well. We're not getting consistent efforts off the boards. Can't blame everybody for that. You sure can't run the ball when you don't have it. And that's just what it amounts to."

Boston State Easy Win for Skaters

By DAN KAMAL

BOSTON--It looked to be a tough evening.

UMass, in a recent tailspin which has had them lose two Division II encounters in the last four days and heading into the egg-shaped rink that usually plays havoc on the visiting teams seemed to be in for a hard night. It was anything but that as the Redmen scored a surprisingly easy victory over the Boston State Warriors in a near empty Boston arena last night.

The handful of fans saw a penalty filled game in which UMass scored four power play goals. Boston State opened the scoring at 3:20 of the first period as Rick Mattell, a defenseman, let a long slapshot go from the blue line with his team shorthanded and the rising shot beat P.J. Flaherty cleanly.

It was not indicative, however, of how the rest of the game would go as UMass tied the score a minute and a half later with Mike Waldron scoring the first goal of his three goal hat trick. That was all the scoring for the first period.

Boston State took a lead they would seoon relinquish at 1:51 when Frank Legro scored from in close.

UMass answered that with five consecutive goals as it completely took over the game. Goals by Waldron, Jack Edwards, Dan Reidy, Waldron again, and Don Lowe made the game a Redmen runaway.

This flurry of UMass scores was answered by only one Warrior goal by Duncan Campbell who moved in alone on P.J. Flaherty and knocked in his own rebound after P.J. had made the intial stop. This score came late in the second period and UMass led after two 6-3.

Don Riley increased the UMass lead to four goals at 5:52 of the final frame as he took a pass from Eric Scrafield in the slot and beat Warrior goalie Doug Brooks. A couple of minutes later Reidy scored his second goal of the game again on a rebound to close out the UMass scoring for the night. As it turned out, it was not necessary.

Campbell closed out the scoring for the game at 16:41 as he put a rebound by Flaherty. It was, however, quite meaningless.

It would appear that the Redmen have escaped from the doldrums as they turned in a fine hockey game. The defense was more than adequate, especially on penalty killing. The offense, which has had its trouble in the last couple of games, came alive last night as the Redmen combined a slapshot-from-the-goal by Lowe, a tip in by Waldron from the blue line, two rebounds by Reidy, and in-close goals by Riley, Waldron (two), and Edwards, the latter's coming on a pass directly off the face-off by Pat Keenan.

Another important factor in this game was the Redmen's ability to score with a man advantage, something they have not done very well all year.

An interesting sideline to the game--Keenan was called on an intent to injure penalty late in the contest and is automatically suspended for the next game.

After the humiliating defeat by St. Anselm's Monday, Eric Scrafield noted that the Redmen had to put it back together. It appears as though they have.

IT'S A FAKE and go, and...an elbow as UMass center Pat Keenan is seen trying to outmaneuver his Williams opponent, but seems to have run into an obstructing elbow. (MDC Photo by Dick McConnell.)

Road Perils Await Redmen

By EARLE BARROLL

The perils of Yankee Conference road games await the UMass basketball team as the Redmen head into their stretch drive for a fifth successive Conference title.

Right now there are four games remaining in the YanCon for UMass, three are on the road and if history is any indicator, UNH, URI and Maine will be anything but resembling a welcoming committee for the Redmen when they step into these away zones.

Tonight, obstacle number one confronts the Redmen in the form of New Hampshire. Last year at Durham, the Wildcats came within three points of duplicating the Springfield upset the previous week. Earlier in the season UMass stomped UNH at the Cage, but this is a common occurrence in this conference...win at home and hope on the road.

Since that time the Wildcats have gone from the depths of depression to a relatively stable state of success and just recently they knocked off UConn at Storrs, 73-65 to run their record to 12-7.

It is also since that time that UMass has gone from a three game tailspin to right back into a possible N.I.T. position as a result of big bombing of Boston University and a complete and shocking demolition of Rhode Island. The record stands at 13-8.

Game time is 8 p.m. WMUA will be on hand to cover all the action with air time at 7:50.

The Time Has Come

By JOHN BOCK

"The time has come, my friends, to talk of many things. Of cabbages and carpenters and whether UMass can win the New Englands again..."Besides not rhyming, any fan of Alice in Wonderland knows that Lewis Carroll did not write of the UMass wrestling team in his tale of a journey through the Wonderland.

But the time has come indeed to discuss whether or not the UMass grapplers can retain the title they usurped from Springfield a year ago. Come on the journey back through the season and decide if the Redmen can remain number one in the NEIWA.

Bleak was the beginning of the season as the team finished 3-5-1 before semester break. Wins over UConn (28-12), MIT (27-8), and WPI (36-9) were far overshadowed by losses to Yale (23-12), Lock Haven (29-7), California State (20-11), Columbia (29-11), and Harvard (20-11). The only tie came from Central Connecticut, coincidentally this year's host of the New England Tourney.

Of course, those were the days that the team had not settled their weight problems, school problems and a myriad of other things that seem to beset a wrestler at the start of the season. Performance wise the team came to depend on veterans Godowsky, Buckbee, Dambman, Jester and freshmen Chateauneuf, McGlaughlin, Cadwallader, and Rome.

The "second season" was a resounding success as the Redmen romped over Oswego (27-11), Springfield (17-16), Coast Guard (25-5), Dartmouth (36?7), URI (20-17), Maine (39-3), and UConn (31-2). The only loss was to 20th ranked Army. The change in team attitude was remarkable, though, as Goldberg was in the lineup to stay, Mike Duffy entered at 167 and allowed Conan Cadwallader to go to 185, and weight problems were solved for most of the team, thus allowing them to wrestle without worry.

The time of the tournament has arrived and the team has prepared in what can only be said to be "blood, sweat and tears." The seeding meeting was held and after returning from that Coach Barr said, "We need at least three upset wins, because on paper Springfield is the favorite. But, then if you want to be the champ you got to win 'em all."

Track Rumblings Hit Varsity M

By EARLE BARROLL

Move over Sam Silverman...Jim Mulcahy's on the way.

Yes, once again the finest match maker in Western Mass., Varsity M Club President Jim Mulcahy brought together another great card at yesterday's luncheon at the Newman Center.

The timing couldn't have been better..the rumblings from Maine are still shaking this campus after the UMass track team shocked UConn over the weekend.

But it was Mulcahy himself who engineered the schedule months before which brought the architect of the UConn ambush, track coach Ken O'Brien and two of the villains, co-captains Al Mangan and Jim Graves to speak yesterday before a large gathering.

And not to slight the woman's program, O'Brien brought along with him two of the finest woman runners in the United States, Charlotte Lettis and Kathy Lawson. They spoke last. As O'Brien put it, "I'll save the best until last."

Graves, who won 60-yard hurdles on Saturday, destroyed any ideas that track was the individualistic sport that so many have thought it to be.

"All I'd have to do is take the critics up to Maine last Saturday and show them what team work is all about," he said. "It was the most beautiful thing I've seen.

"No one gave us a chance before the meet, but every member of the team gave so much effort to motivate each other during the meet. They lined the track and cheered on their teammates and it grew so loud that the Maine fans were drowned out."

And just to prove his point a little more he said, "UConn hardly uttered a word during the meet and they finished second."

Mangan explained the victory in terms of the "Puzzle Theory":

"Three parts make up this theory-training, motivation and right timing. Against Brown earlier in the season we had the motivation, but lacked the physical strength and timing so early in the schedule.

"When we faced Northeastern and UConn recently we had the training, but lacked the motivation and timing. But when it came to the conference meet we put all three ingredients together and this was the story of the success."

Ms. Lettis has had probably the fastest development of any woman track star in the country. "One of the main reasons for running is because I'm a woman," she emphasized.

"For me, running's a discipline. I started running in June when I used to smoke three packs of cigarettes a day (she has stopped) and in the beginning there was a lot of success as I won the New England cross-country championship only four months later.

"But now it's a lot of work and on Friday night I'll be running the mile at Madison Square Gardens against the big people."

Ms. Lawson is a world class woman sprinter, and one of the odds-on favorites in this summer's Olympics in the 200-meter sprint. This past summer she was the number one woman sprinter for the U.S. on the European tour and she will also be at Madison Square Garden on Friday to try to qualify for the American-Russian meet next month in Richmond, Virginia.

And then came the architect himself, Ken O'Brien. Perhaps his biggest compliment of many he gave to his team was the following: "It's nice to go to practice when you have a team like this waiting for you."

Indeed it is. O'Brien pointed to the fact that during the dual meet season the emphasis was more on working with the personalities of the tracksters and preparing them for the Conference meet and the New Englands rather than going all out week after week for dual meet glory.

"We trained for the end," he said. His methods may be patented around New England track circles.

And if it's any consolation for the rest of the conference, when spring track rolls around here's the pre-season prognostication from O'Brien:

"With the added sprint and eight events to go along with what we have now, we should be stronger outdoors."

Gulp!!! (So says UConn.)

Bromery Hits University Budget Cuts

By JIM DEMPSEY

Acting Chancellor Randolph Bromery told yesterday's meeting of the Faculty Senate that Governor Sargent's proposed budget would not halt the growth of the university but rather "erode" the quality of education on this campus. Vice-Chancellor Gluckstern then went on to give details of the Governor's budget for fiscal 72-73.

In other Faculty Senate business, the Chairman of the Students Offering Support, Joseph Sylvia asked for Faculty-Senate support in the Belchertown unit. Also, the Transportation Committee presented its final report and a motion concerning departmental autonomy as related to the Ms. Freida Salzman case, was tabled.

In his address before the faculty body, Gluckstern emphasized the importance of savings in this year's budget. These savings occur when faculty vacancies appear. This year's allowance for savings is $1,700,000, as compared with $1 million in 1972 and $600,000 for 1971. Sources are now being sought out to meet the additional$700,000 in savings.

"We're exploring what minimum resources are necessary to meet these obligations," Gluckstern said. He went on to name substantial reduction of the scope of the Summer School Program, reduction of part-time student help pay increases and once again faculty vacancies as possible sources of savings. He said there are many difficulties associated with the reduction of savings and that it is now being discussed. He added, "We are now in a hold position. We will adjust as time goes on to further information that appears."

Whistles and moans and general disbelief filled the hall when Gluckstern quoted figures concerning the UMass Medical School in Worcester, and the Boston UMass campus. Worcester has been asked to take a 40% student body increase, as well as 20 new courses with the addition of NO new faculty. Boston will receive an 18% student body increase with NO additional faculty.

The situation here at Amherst is just as dangerous and potentially detrimental to the quality of education. Vice-Chancellor Gluckstern fears that we will sacrifice quality education with such a low budget.

Responding to a question of what the faculty can do about this shutdown of new faculty positions, Gluckstern said that such a situation "may mean that some teachers will be asked to teach additional courses and that many courses may be loaded. We must take some posture that the quality of education under these circumstances will be eroded."

Answering another question, Gluckstern admitted that we might be asked to share the increased burdens of the other campuses, because "we have a greater capacity to absorb additional students." He assured the audience that "a cost of living raise will be accompanied by a separate accommodation."

The Ad Hoc Transportation Committee presented its final report to the meeting, listing its conclusions and recommendations. Professor Paul Shuldiner cited the following as necessary for the solution of UMass parking problems:

1) establishment of a $2.50 base charge for each registered vehicle;

2) surcharges for additional services;

3) meetings with Univerity authorities to assess and retain parking fees;

4) the parking policy be made part of the comprehensive planning for the physical development of the University;

President of the Student Senate Lee Sandwen questioned Shuldiner about the identical prices charged for lot 6 and V lot--when there is an obvious difference in their nearness to the central campus. He also mentioned that students park in V lot, where faculty use 6. Sandwen cited the Committee's recommendations as "preserving the existing situation." Shuldiner retorted, "Not necessarily."

Senator Ellen Gerber added to the discussion on the parking situation, "You're asking us to approve a basic fee. If we vote on your recommendations we give the whole thing back to the Administration."

Shuldiner said that the Transportation Committee's recommendations would provide for the representation of the Faculty Senate and students. Pressured once again for an answer regarding the injustice of the parking fees, Shuldiner replied, "regardless of their status, they pay for what they get." A motion for dismissal of the Committee was then passed.

A motion by Joseph Burroughs asking that the Faculty Senate endorse the principle of departmental autonomy in matters of hiring, promotion, granting of tenure, principles of due process and open hearings on grievances was tabled. This was specifically related to the Dr. Freida Salzman case.

A Special Report proposing a Master of Special Studies Degree designed primarily for part-time off-campus students, won the general approval of the Senate. This will now be referred to the Curriculum Committee of the Graduate Council and to the Academic Matters Committee for study and action.

Mr. Joseph Sylvia, chairman of Students Offering Support organization asked the Faculty Senate for its support in the pending Belchertown class-action suit. He asked for 100% backing "in working towards this just cause." He reminded them that the Student Senate had already granted his organization its full support. Sylvia spoke of this suit as being representative of not only the 28 mentally retarded children involved in the suit, but all the mentally retarded at Belchertown and in the state of Massachusetts as well. He cited two objectives for the plan: 1) to gain friends of the court; 2) to gain funds for the suit. No action on Sylvia's request was taken.

A presentation by Professor Matthew Zunic of the Physical Education Department was interrupted in favor of a written summary to be presented to each Senator. He was speaking on athletic ineligibility on campus and outlining his personal history with this "deceit of the students on campus."

The meeting was recessed until next Thursday when further business, not acted on yesterday, will be taken up.

Student Vote Makes Difference (?)

By CHARLEY BERKOW

The Daily Hampshire Gazette said that the Student vote didn't make much of a difference in the upset results of Tuesday's local elections in Amherst. (Only 98 votes separated Selectman-Elect Bob Garvey from defeated incumbent Stephen Keedy.)

A campaign worker for Selectman-elect Leo Bouchard said that the election was so close that a hundred votes could have made a big difference. More than a hundred students probably voted.

Estelle Matusko, town clerk in Amherst, said that she was disappointed by the student turnout. But it was a bad day all around for voting, as only about 2,800 people voted out of more than 7,000 registered voters.

It is difficult to determine just how many students voted. Workers for Leo Bouchard conducted a survey of how many students voted Tuesday. They found that 34 newly registered voters living in dorms in precinct 2 voted, just four voted in precinct 7, and 54 voted in precinct 3.

However, many students live off-campus. And they might be expected to take a greater interest in Amherst politics, since they pay rents and utilities in Amherst. It is hard to tell how many of these students voted.

But the total student vote was probably well over a hundred.

The vote in general, followed a trend, of sorts, established last year before students became eligible to vote, of young, liberal candidates defeating older candidates and incumbents.

However, in the caucus (primary) voting on January 19th, Stephen Keedy, who lost his bid for re-election to the Board of Selectmen Tuesday, finished first. Selectman-elect Bob Garvey, who finished second on Tuesday, finished second in the caucus. And Leo Bouchard, the top vote-getter on Tuesday, finished third in the caucus.

Ben Surner and John MacGillivray, a student, finished last in the caucus, and didn't make the ballot for Tuesday's election. MacGillivray got over 300 of the approximately two-thousand votes cast in the caucus.

The caucus was on January 19th, during the semester break, when many students could be expected to be out of town.

The Spark, an underground newspaper that popped up this month, claimed that the caucus was purposely held during semester break so that student candidates would not make the ballot. Stephen Gluckstern, an Amherst College student running for School Committee, was also knocked off the regular election ballot in the caucus.

However, Estelle Matusko, the town clerk, said that it was "absolutely impossible" for absentee ballots to be available for the caucus, if it were held any earlier. New state law makes it illegal to hold primaries before absentee ballots are available. Election rules prevented it from being held later.

Stephen Keedy won in precinct 2 (containing Southwest) in the caucus. On Tuesday, he finished third there, behind Bouchard and Garvey.

Frank Decker won precinct 7 (containing Sylvan, Puffton Village, Colonial Apts., etc.) in the primary. Leo Bouchard, endorsed by Student Senate President Lee Sandwen, won it on Tuesday.

Not to be forgotten are the three students elected to the town Meeting from precinct 2, George Mingins of 41 Phillips Street, Neil Coleman, of 367 Moore House, and Elliot Sherman, of 2016 John Adams, who received 5 votes-enough to win-in a last-minute write-in Campaign.

The students did have an impact on the town election.

Town clerk Estelle Matusko expects that student participation in the presidential primary will be greater. She thinks that students have a greater and more deeply rooted interest in the national elections than in town elections. Another voter registration drive is scheduled to be held on campus in March, in time for the presidential primary when students who came to the area in September will have lived here the requisite six months for official residency.

Quinn Opposes Abortion Change

BOSTON(AP)-Atty. Gen. Robert F. Quinn told a legislative committee Thursday he opposed efforts to change the state's 126-year-old abortion laws for legal, not moral, reasons.

He told the joint legislative Commmttee on Social Welfare that he spoke against bills to revise or repeal the law "not on religious or moral bases, but as a lawyer and public official."

Changing the law "is not medically necessary and no physician in this Commonwealth can seriously maintain otherwise.

"To subject the unborn life to the arbitrary judgment of the only other life with which it has any relationship the mother is a terrible injustice and contrary to the principles of our Commonwealth and the nation."

Two of the five woman members of the Massachusetts legislature testified against the bills and a woman lawmaker from Maine went before the committee in support of them.

Both of the Massachusetts women represent heavily Catholic Somerville. Both are Democrats.

Rep. Marie E. Howe said she opposed the moves to revise the laws because "I am totally opposed to the legalization of murder in Massachusetts."

"The 20th century had one madman who tried by genocide to eliminate a race: by opening up abortion in Massachusetts you will allow genocide on all the unborn children in this state."

"By opening up abortion in Massachusetts you will allow genocide of all the unborn children in this state," she said. "One madman a century is more than enough. Let's not have any laws depicting a madman's actions."

Rep. Mary E. Fantasia, a former Democratic National Committeewoman, told the committee she opposed the bills because, if she did not, "it would be irresponsible execution of my office as a legislator."

Lowenstein Urges Students To Vote

By IMELDA REJAK

Speaking to an audience of about 50 UMass. students on Wednesday night in Pierpont dormitory, Ex-Congressman Allard Lowenstein urged young people to get out and vote.

"Almost no bosy feels Nixon should be President," Lowenstein commented. But, "If only the people who vote are for Nixon, then the system won't work. Nixon's situation is virtually foreclosed if people vote."

Lowenstein attacked the current "I don't care about politics" attitude. "You have the idea that things are impossible and so no one works and so things are impossible," he said.

"Most of you have luxury that enables you to say, "I don't care who's elected president." You don't live in a village in Laos. If you let Nixon get away with his deceptions, the people in Indochina will go on dying," Lowenstein pointed out.

Lowenstein stressed the importance of electing someone the people can trust. "There is a difference between an occasional lie and a systematic deception like that of Johnson and Nixon."

Lowenstein talked briefly about several of the 1972 presidential candidates. "McCloskey has a great deal of courage and decency. Muskie was late learning what he was for but that's not the same as still being for the war. He is completely honest about what he thinks. And McGovern-there's a few things you can't admire about him," he said.

Lowenstein ended his talk by pointing out that the 18-21 year old vote can make a big difference. "There are 25 million newly enfranchised voters. We should remember that Nixon was elected by only one half million votes over Humphrey."

"I guess I did it because I'm kind of crazy. I guess that's why he married me in the first place." That was Mrs. Chuck Wilson's comment when asked why she had chosen to inform her husband that she was having a baby by having his drink served in a baby bottle at the Top of the Campus last night. "I still don't believe it" was ail the incredulous Mr. Wilson could say.

The incident started yesterday afternoon when Mrs. Wilson informed the Collegian office by phone of her plan. With the aid of a cooperative waitress (and a Collegian photographer in the wings) the whole plan came off just as anticipated. Mr. Wilson probably hasn't recovered yet.

Student Busted Here

Yesterday afternoon at about 5:15 University Police, acting alone (NOT with State Police help as was first reported), conducted a narcotics raid in Pierpont House.

Accused of possession and possession with intent to sell narcotics is Daniel C. Finer of Glen Eagle Drive, Mashpee and of Pierpont House.

University Police told the Collegian that a search warrant was issued yesterday afternoon and that the raid netted "a substantial quantity of narcotics and harmful drugs."

Arraignment is tomorrow in Northampton District Court. The investigation is continuing.

S.O.S. Drive Today

Students will be given a second opportunity today to rectify the horrifying and inhumane conditions which now exist at the Belchertown State School for the retarded.

Students Offering Support (SOS) will man a table for the second day in a row in the Campus Center concourse level between 9:00 a.m. and 4:30 p.m. The object of the two-day drive is to solicit support and funds from students who are interested in supporting the class action suit filed by 28 parents in U.S. District Court which would alleviate many of the inhumane conditions and unjust policies at Belchertown.

L.A.O.S. To Hold Tea

The Laymen's Academy for Oecumenical Studies (LAOS), an Amherst based organization for the promotion of ecumenism, will hold an Author's Tea at the Academy's Religious Book Center, 16 Spring Street, on Saturday afternoon in Amherst. Dr. Sten Stenson, professor of religion at Smith College, will be the author featured at the 3:00 P.M. event. Dr. Stenson's book, Sense and Nonsense in Religion, won the Abindgon Award for its contribution to the field of religion two years ago.

C.C.Building Comm.Asks Support

By ANNE SMITH

What would you as a student of the University like to see changed or adjusted in the Campus Center Building, which serves the college community? Have you some ideas on how the building could be used or improved? If you do have thoughts on the subject, the Campus Center Building Committee, a subcommittee of the Student Union Governing Board would be interested in hearing any ideas you have.

The committee, formed when the building was opened two years ago, has been working on improvements and ways of utilizing the building. In explaining the function of the committee, John Barbaro, chairman, said that "all physical modifications, and all work orders must go through this committee, and that this gives students a check."

Meeting once a week in the Campus Center on Wednesdays, policies concerning the use of the building are made. The chairman also commented that the "Potential for that committee is fantastic," but feels that more student backing is needed to make the committee more effective. "With a low student imput, it's a hard job," he said.

The committee members are John Barbaro (grad. student) chairman, Paul Bigelow (Asst. Management), Jim Riley (Student Activities Staff Member), Barbara Aldrich (Scheduling Desk), and Rod Tripp, Steve Breed, and Mark Fitzgerald (Students).

In the past, the committe has worked on innovations such as approving the building of a plexiglass slide next to the escalator leading to the first level of the Campus Center, the addition of pinball machines, and approving budgets for buying items such as cushions for chairs, and tables. They are also in charge of the Craft workshop, located in the old section of the Student Union. This committee "tries to enact acts passed by the Campus Center Governing Board" said Barbaro.

Topics discussed at this week's meeting concerned policies on the RSO tables on the Concourse Level of the Center. The budget will be among the topics to be discussed in the future meetings.

Ouster Asked Of Monson Head

BOSTON — A special commission probing Monson State Hospital Tuesday sued an interim report calling for the ouster of the institution's superintendent Dr. Marlin H. Roll. The commission, headed by Sen. Philip A. Quinn, D-Spencer, and Rep. Alexander Lolas, D-Monson, is charged with investigating both the Monson facility and Belchertown State School. It issued a highly critical report on the latter institution last year. The report issued Tuesday was the group's first on the Monson facility.

"This special commission has become convinced that unless the present superintendent (Roll) resigns or is replaced, there will be no chance for substantial improvement at Monson State Hospital," the report said.

It reiterated earlier blasts at the Department of Mental Health, headed by Commissioner Milton Greenblatt.

"In our most recent report, we concluded that reform of structure of the Department of Mental Health itself was necessary. Our experience at Monson State Hospital confirms that finding," the report said.

It indicated the commission's intent to file legislation in the current General Court session providing for "a comprehensive reform" of the DMH.

The commission earlier issued two scathing reports about conditions at Belchertown State School.

The first report, a massive document, led to the early retirement of Supt. Lawrence P. Bowser. The second contributed to the demotion of Dr. William Fraenkel from assistant commissioner of mental health and acting superintendent of Belchertown to regional administrator.

The commission was formed following a series in The Union "The Tragedy of Belchertown," which exposed inhumane living conditions at the institution.

The report maintained Roll's efforts at reform at the institution since he was named superintendent last May have been superficial and publicity oriented.

"While on the surface there appears to be activity, careful inspection reveals the record of the administration to date to be unprofessional and indicative of incompetence and neglect," it said.

"In recent months," it declared, "the administration has sponsored accelerated publicity in the media concerning the hospital (at Monson), giving the appearance of change where little change has taken place."

The committee said "one of the most leading" publicity plays was the recent publication of results of an "alleged poll of employes of the institution by the Department of Mental Health.

"The results supposedly indicated there was high morale among the employes," the report said. "What the news release failed to mention was that the (employe) union publicly opposed the survey, that the members of the administration and the social service department of the hospital personally requested employes to fill out the questionnaire, and that a majority of them, at that time, 750 employes who were approached on this matter."

The commission concluded that "In view of the opposition of the union and the personalized requests to fill out the questionnaire made by the administration, it is obvious that many employes expressed their low morale and dissatisfaction with the administration by refusing to answer the questionnaire."

The commission charged that Roll had recruited many new employes at the hospital, has been praising and promoting them and ignoring and discouraging veteran employes.

"As to the future, unless the administration makes a clear commitment to improving the lives of the paients and not to factions of employes, "incidents of patient abuse among the favored few will increase and patient care will generally decline," it said. "This cannot be allowed to happen. The administration must tighten up its disciplinary procedures and apply them equally to all employes."

The report also sharply criticized the conduct of the DMH and the MSH administration toward the Quinn-Lolas commission. It charges the administration "has used its influence in a most direct manner to hamper our efforts to obtain information. The administration has attempted to stifle the flow of information and testimony to the special commission, and has treated it with a lack of candor. These efforst have intensified with the passage of time."

The report charges the administration "has inferred improper motivation on the part of members of this special commission and has resorted to innuendo relative to the press and politics."

The report heaped extensive criticism on the DMH administration's effort at "unitization" of authority lines at MSH as a means of reform. The program involved massive moving of patients at the hospital for retarded epileptics.

"As a direct result of the move and the manner of the move," it said, "employe morale has been further lowered and patient care has been severely compromised.

"Living conditions have been worsened in many buildings. Conditions on the "back wards' have deteriorated seriously. By reason of the move, programming for the residents has not only been interrupted, but for many, it has come to a complete halt. Many residents have regressed. Health, welfare and safety of the majority of the residents is presently for the first time very conjective."

Supt. Roll, who took the job after efforts to recruit a new superintendent by the state failed, had no comment last night.

Roll said he had not seen a copy of the report and first learned of the commission's recommendations when contacted by The Union.
